Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, before entering on a matter of this kind, there ought to be a little more consideration of the point as to whether the change proposed is really in the interest of economy. The printing of this Government must in large part be done here by the Government Printing Office, because it is exigency work; but this postage-stamp printing is not exigency work.
This work can be done in large quantities and ahead of the demand for it, and being work of that character it can be done cheaper by private parties than by the Government. Now whether these proposals were as low as they ought to be, I do not undertake to say; but if they were not, there are several concerns in this country doing just such work, and the proper course is to invite proposals and go ahead.
Mr. BRYAN. What did it cost to do this work last year?
Mr. DINGLEY. I do not know; but I know that the new bids are very much under the old bids.
Mr. BRYAN. Then there must have been a great deal of money made by the contractors.
Mr. DINGLEY. Possibly. But this is not a business that is monopolized by one concern, or by any five concerns in this country.
Mr. BRYAN. How many bids were made?
Mr. DINGLEY. I think there were four or five bids. I think they varied in amount nearly $25,000. All that I desire, Mr. Chairman, is simply to call the attention of the committee to the fact that because the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has bid $7,000 a year less than the lowest bid by outside parties, it does not at all follow that the work is going to be done for any such sum. And I predict, and predict with some knowledge of the subject, that the cost of the work will be vastly in excess of the amount that is estimated.
Mr. HUDSON. I will ask the gentleman from Maine if he knows whether or not there was a large profit growing out of the printing of these stamps under the last contract?
Mr. DINGLEY. I do not know. It was done by private parties.
Mr. HUDSON. You do not know anything about the profits of those private parties?
Mr. DINGLEY. I do not know what the profits were.
Mr. HUDSON. I did not know but that the amount of the profit might enable the Government to do the work cheaper than it could be done by private parties.
Mr. DINGLEY. The last bids are very much lower than those made four years ago, and in fact the work can be done cheaper now than it could have been done some time ago.
Mr. SAYERS. In reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Maine, I will say to the committee that a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations had the superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing before it, and he told them that with the amount he had proposed he could not only manufacture all the stamps that were necessary, but that he could expend about $25,000 out of it in the purchase of such machinery as would be required to manufacture stamps, and that thereafter he would be able to save some forty to fifty thousand dollars a year by doing the work in the Bureau, as compared with the cost of having the same work done by private parties.
The committee will remember that there was an item of about $38,000 in the sundry civil bill for the construction of a third story over that portion of the building which is now known as the boiler house.
The construction of that third story would be necessary even if the Bureau were not authorized to manufacture stamps. An estimate of $140,000 was asked for by the Bureau, and the Committee on Appropriations allowed only $38,000 for the purpose, as I have said, of constructing this third story. The remainder of the estimate, over $100,000, was not intended for the construction of that story, but to replace wooden buildings that are now being used, with brick buildings, so as to make the Bureau more secure. It was not intended to secure increased space, but merely to substitute brick for wooden buildings.
By reference to a statement which has been furnished me, it will be found that in 1890 the New York Bank Note Company received $155,874 for the manufacture of stamps, the number then required being much less than now.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman tell me what restrictions there are on the company that prints these stamps, to prevent counterfeiting?

Mr. SAYERS. I am not able to give the committee any information on that subject. The manufacture of the stamp has been entirely in the hands of the company itself.

Mr. COX. Is not the risk much greater when the stamps are printed in that way, than if they were printed by the Government?

Mr. SAYERS. Unquestionably. Now, in 1891——

Mr. MILLIKEN. Has the Government ever suffered from the counterfeiting of these stamps?

Mr. SAYERS. I can not say.

Mr. DUNPHY. But the Government has never complained at any rate.

Mr. SAYERS. It is impossible to detect a counterfeit postage stamp as readily as you would detect a counterfeit Government bond or note.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But has there ever been any complaint made or any suspicion——

Mr. SAYERS. I have never heard of any complaint.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Then it does not seem necessary to anticipate trouble until there has been some suggestion or suspicion of that kind.

Mr. SAYERS. It is very desirable that the manufacture and preservation of postage stamps should be made as secure as possible.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. I ask for a couple of minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. In 1893 the Government expended $192,773.82 for the manufacture of stamps; and in 1893 when that heavy speculation was to take place by which the Government was to make two million and a half of dollars net from the manufacture of Columbian stamps, though according to the report of the Postmaster-General it has not in fact made a dollar, we find that the sum of $312,110.93 was paid by the Government——

Mr. DUNPHY. For altogether different stamps.

Mr. SAYERS. Altogether different stamps, I admit.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Of course it could not be expected that an engraving of the Landing of Columbus could be furnished as cheaply as an ordinary stamp.

Mr. SAYERS. Having said thus much, I will not detain the committee longer.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to make a single suggestion in connection with the remarks of my colleague on the committee [Mr. SAYERS]. That gentleman has said that the superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing stated that he would require in any event to have the building enlarged.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. In that connection it should be borne in mind that the work ordinarily to be done in the next fiscal year by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing will be less than has been done in the past. In view of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act which authorized the issue of new Treasury notes, the work to be done will be less than in the past; and it hardly seems to me possible that with less work of the ordinary character to be done this Bureau would be obliged to have an enlargement of the building unless some additional work were imposed upon it. Hence I am disposed to assume that the Bureau was preparing in advance an excuse in reference to the enlargement of the building which would come with this additional work.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to my colleague on the committee [Mr. DINGLEY] that the subcommittee who prepared the sundry civil bill was very careful in its examination of that estimate. There were two of us certainly who went over and examined the building themselves; and I received the assurance—I believe the statement will be found in the hearings before the subcommittee—that for the comfort of the men now working in the building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the construction of the third story would be absolutely necessary; and that the balance of the estimate, amounting to something over $100,000, was needed to replace old wooden buildings with brick buildings. It is also proper that I should say that the Superintendent of the Bureau did state in the hearings that one of the grounds on which he based his estimate was the anticipation of printing the postage stamps.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think that is the sole ground.

Mr. SAYERS. He did not say the sole ground; he said it was one of the grounds.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has stated that it will be necessary to enlarge the building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in order to do the work of printing the postage stamps.

Mr. DINGLEY. The building and the plant generally.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now I have here a statement furnished by the Chief of the Bureau to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. In this statement he uses this language:

> The Bureau is amply able to do the work on the postage stamps. There is no kind of work on these stamps that the Bureau is not now doing on the stamps for the Internal Revenue Bureau; and surely, if it has without interruption successfully executed these stamps for the past sixteen years, it can execute the work on the postage stamps.

The Chief of the Bureau further says that no further appropriation will be necessary over and above the estimate submitted to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. REED. That is to say this officer wants the extension on account of the pressure upon him; and some more pressure will not make any difference?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not understand the force of the gentleman's remark. Does he refer to the Chief of the Bureau?

Mr. REED. Yes. There has been demanded from the Appropriations Committee an appropriation to enlarge the accommodations; and now the gentleman says that a work requiring one hundred and fifty men will not require any further enlargement.

Mr. SPRINGER. So far as printing the stamps is concerned the Chief of the Bureau has stated to the committee that this work can be performed in the Bureau with the present plant. I will reply to the gentleman from Maine by reading the words of the Chief of the Bureau, Mr. Johnson, who is more competent than either of us to settle this question.

He says that "the Bureau of Engraving and Printing thoroughly understands the work that it has entered upon and will faithfully carry it out."

Mr. COOMBS. Whose letter is that from which you have been quoting?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is a memorandum or statement made to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads by the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. He goes on to say:

> It is not necessary to enter into a detailed explanation of how he proposes to do it. It is sufficient to accept his guarantee that he will do it.

That statement was made to a committee of this House for its guidance by an officer of the Government, and we are bound to accept the statement as true, because it is the only source from which we can get information upon the subject.

Mr. DINGLEY. But will the gentleman pardon me a moment? Does not he know, does not his own common sense teach him, that it would require more men, more machinery, and more room to do this additional work than to do the work the Government is now doing? If you have too many men they, of course, will have to be discharged.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer that. Of course, the additional force will be provided for in the appropriation of the money which is asked for this office and which was made heretofore to private parties. That amount of money is now to be given to the employés of the Government, instead of to outside parties.

Mr. REED. But there must be more people employed.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the Bureau will have the money appropriated in this bill with which to pay them. But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] says that we pay higher wages and that it will cost the Government more to do this work in the manner here proposed. The answer is that we have already a plant which is, according to all intelligent statements upon the subject, nearly if not quite sufficient to do the work now. We have all the motive power that is necessary for the purpose of doing the work, and practically we have all the plant that is needed for it. Now, the additional amount to be paid for a few additional employés will not increase the expense so much as it would if you gave the whole contract to private parties.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman, I think, is mistaken in that.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think not. It is simply a question between the right of the Government to perform its own printing or compel it to let it to private contractors, who can make as large remuneration for themselves as the contracts will permit them to make.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I propose, and this provision is intended for that purpose, to give the benefit of the contract to the Government, instead of to private parties. If private parties did not get benefit from it they would not be insisting on having it as against the Government. The Postmaster-General is endeavoring to have the work of the Department done in the best possible manner and at the lowest possible rates, and Congress ought to encourage him instead of throwing obstructions in his way.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNPHY. It is a very serious question, Mr. Chairman, whether the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is able to-day to do this work at all. The Secretary of the Treasury has communicated to Congress on this question, and I will ask the committee to listen to his language, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

One of the most pressing needs of this Bureau is additional room for the performance of its work, which has increased enormously since the original building in which it is located was designed in 1878. In that year the total number of sheets produced was 15,098,756, while in 1893 the number produced was 48,883,528, or an increase very nearly fourfold. Many of the employés required to execute this very large increase have been obliged to work in the cellar and other unsuitable places, and they have been greatly overcrowded in other parts of the building.

I am informed that this has resulted in a condition of affairs that would not be tolerated in manufacturing establishments by many of the States. The best work can not reasonably be expected from such conditions. The remedy is for Congress to provide for the completion of the outbuilding of the Bureau, in which many of the processes now carried on in the main building can be conducted, and for an enlargement of the central projection of the building, plans for both of which have been prepared and estimates of the cost of which will be submitted to Congress. The completion of the outbuilding would also provide for the proper accommodation of branches of the work that are now performed in temporary wooden sheds, and for the storage of valuable material. I earnestly urge upon Congress the appropriation of the necessary money for this work.

Mr. DUNPHY. The Secretary of the Treasury claims, it will be seen, that on account of insufficient room the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was not able to bring the work up to the high grade of efficiency that he desired. And he tells us that it is necessary for Congress to take into consideration the question as to whether an appropriation for extra building should not be made.

Mr. Johnson, the Chief of the Bureau, came before the Committee on Appropriations, or rather before the subcommittee in charge of the preparation of the sundry civil bill, and he gave some testimony there as to just what the condition of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was. He said they did not have room enough to do even the work now in his Department. He said that the increase for next year would be about 8,000,000 sheets. He said he was not taking into consideration the question of printing stamps at all, but that in order to bring his work up to a high grade—the work now in the office—he ought to have additional room. He estimated the cost of a new building to be $130,000.

Instead of appropriating $130,000 for the new building, we appropriated $28,000 with which to repair the old one; and that is all that has been done. Mr. Johnson testified that in order to print the postage stamps it would be necessary for him to employ one hundred additional men. He makes that statement in answer to a direct question. He says further, that "In order to print these stamps it will be necessary to put in ten printing presses, and I am informed that the space required for the gumming, cutting, perforating and printing the stamps will be at least 12,000 square feet."

Now, under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, how is the Bureau going to do the work at all? Where is it going to get the room to do the work in?

These, Mr. Chairman, are very serious questions indeed, and I bring them to the attention of the committee just now, citing the evidence of the two best witnesses that could be called, the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing himself, and his superior officer, the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I have an amendment to that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Strike out the word "three," and insert the word "two" in line 20, page 5, and after line 20, page 5, insert the following:

"Provided, That section 3 of an act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, be amended to read as follows: 'That a special stamp of the face valuation of 10 cents may be provided and issued, whenever deemed advisable or expedient, in such form and bearing such device as may meet the approval of the Postmaster-General, which, when attached to a letter, in addition to the lawful postage thereon, shall entitle said letter to immediate delivery at any point within 1 mile of the post-office to which it is addressed; and when two of such stamps are attached to a letter, in addition to the lawful postage, said letter shall be entitled to immediate delivery at any point within 2 miles of the post-office to which it is addressed; and when three of such stamps are attached to a letter, in addition to the lawful postage, such letter shall be entitled to immediate delivery at any point within 3 miles of the post-office to which it is addressed;' and one-fifth of the sum received from the sale of such stamps shall be used for the manufacture of adhesive postage and special delivery stamps."

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment that the second portion of it changes existing law and does not reduce expenditures, and I ask that it be divided. The object of the first part evidently is to try to bring it within the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman demands a division of the question. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] for five minutes on the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. If a division of this amendment is allowed, then there can be no possible way of offering an amendment to an appropriation bill reducing expenditures, without having the part which does not reduce expenses subject to the point of order. If that position is sound, then it is absolutely impossible to ever have any reduction of expenses upon an appropriation bill, and at the same time enact new legislation, no matter how beneficial and necessary such new legislation may be.

That amendment as it now stands does reduce the amount of money covered by the bill, and therefore the amendment is not subject to the point of order.

All the members of this House will admit the propriety of a measure of this character. We have been legislating altogether too much for cities. The law as it now stands provides that a letter addressed to any point within 1 mile of a post-office, which nearly always is inside of a city, may be immediately delivered, provided a special delivery 10-cent stamp is attached. Now, I say that the Democratic party is pledged to do its full duty to the whole people, whether living inside or outside of cities. The Republican party has been legislating for corporations and people who live in cities for a third of a century.

Republican legislation has given these favored people innumerable privileges and advantages. The Democratic party must now be just and fair to all people, and we must begin without delay to enact legislation for the benefit of these neglected people who live outside the sacred precincts of a city.

I do not wish to take from cities any of the advantages or privileges which they now have, but the purpose of this amendment is to extend these advantages to the people of the country who have been so long neglected. For years we have had free delivery of all letters and mail matter five or ten times a day which is addressed to the residents of cities, and in addition to this all letters on which a "special delivery" stamp is affixed are delivered immediately to all points within a mile of the post-office.

If it is proper to allow a letter to be delivered within 1 mile, provided it has a special delivery stamp costing 10 cents upon it, it is just as proper to deliver a letter 2 miles off, with two stamps of 10 cents each upon it, and again it is just as proper to extend the privilege so that a letter with three stamps of 10 cents each may be delivered at a point 3 miles from the point of delivery.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] virtually admits that his point of order is not well taken when he is driven to the necessity of asking a division upon my amendment. The amendment reduces the appropriation by $1,000, and at the same time extends the business of the Post-Office Department in such a manner as to make a profit of 20 per cent upon every special delivery letter. I call the especial attention of the Chair to section 6 of the act of March 3, 1885, which is not repealed or affected by this amendment. It will be seen that this section taken in connection with the amendment I have offered would prevent any additional expense to the Government. This settles the point of order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while I am on my feet, I want also to allude to an attack which has been made upon the Post-Office Department by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN]. This gentleman complained that the people of his Territory have been demanding the establishment of post-offices and that the Department refuses to give them postal facilities. He says:

For the last six months cities have existed in the Territory of Oklahoma having a population of from 1,000 to 2,000 people, and the Post-Office Department have been refusing flatly to establish post-offices in those places.

I was very much surprised at this statement from the gentleman from Oklahoma, as I happened to be somewhat familiar with the extraordinary efforts of the Post-Office Department to establish post-offices and mail routes in Oklahoma and give the people of that Territory every postal facility.

My position as chairman of the Committee on the Territories has brought me in close connection and frequent correspondence with the people of that Territory, and I have not heard any complaint of that character from those people. In order to remove any doubt I have made inquiry and I find that the Department is establishing post-offices in Oklahoma as fast as it is possible to get the necessary information which must always be had before issuing commission to postmasters. During the six months preceding March 27, 1894, eighty-eight post-offices were established in Oklahoma, and many more have been established since that time.

I wrote to the Postmaster-General and received from him a letter, which I send to the Clerk's desk to have read, which shows that the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] is unjust and unwarranted.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1894.

SIR: I have your communication of the 27th instant requesting information as to the establishment of post-offices in the Territory of Oklahoma, and in reply will say that there have been established in that Territory since March 4, 1893, 98 offices, 88 of which were established during the past six months. There are 125 cases not yet ready for action because of the fact that papers sent out by the Department asking for necessary information have not been returned by applicants and others interested, or that we have not been advised in regard to some important feature of the case. Our records show no town in Oklahoma whose case has been completed before the Department that has not been supplied with mail facilities.

I might add in this connection that there were in existence in Oklahoma on the 30th of June last 241 post-offices.

Very respectfully,

W. S. BISSELL,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER, M. C.
Washington, D. C.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I regret very much this disposition on the part of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] to make unjust and unwarranted charges.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I hope every member of this House will have enough regard for the people living in rural districts to give them this slight privilege, a thing which so far from being an expense, will be a source of profit to the Government, because my amendment provides that one-fifth of the amount of the sale of these stamps shall go into the Treasury, or be used to defray other expenses of the Post-Office Department.

The experience of our Government shows that every additional postal facility given to the people has resulted in a large increase in our postal revenues. Twenty-five years ago our Post-Office appropriation was only $19,133,000, and even with that amount the revenues failed to reimburse the Government the amount of the appropriation. Last year our Post-Office appropriation was $84,004,314.22, and I am informed the revenues of the Post-Office Department almost reimbursed the Government, for this enormous appropriation, and I am very glad to hear from most reliable sources that economies and good administration which have been devised and introduced by the present able Postmaster-General will result in still further improvements in our postal system.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I desire to press upon the House this amendment as directly in line with the established policy of the Government to extend its postal facilities so as to give the people every convenience possible; and I repeat, if it is proper to allow people in cities to have their letters delivered immediately upon the payment of 10 cents, if they live within 1 mile of the post-office, it is much more proper to give the same privilege to people living outside of cities and living within 2 miles of a post-office, by having 20 cents' worth of stamps put upon a letter; and still further by placing 30 cents' worth of these stamps on a letter, it is proper to have such a letter delivered to a person living within 3 miles of a post-office.

If this amendment is adopted it will in a measure answer as a substitute for the free delivery in the rural districts. How many members of this body desiring to write to a constituent who lives two or three miles away from the post-office would gladly place two stamps, of 10 cents each, on the letter, so as to have it delivered immediately upon receipt at the post-office. I hope the members of the House will give that consideration to the farmers and other people in the rural districts that is afforded in this amendment. I hope and trust that there will not be one dissenting vote upon a measure which is important to a great class of the people who have not been treated fairly by the legislation of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. However meritorious the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Alabama may be, it would effect an entire change of existing law and set up an entirely new system of prompt delivery. It changes existing law on its face, and the Chair can not sustain it. It is claimed that it reduces expenditure, because it reduces the amount of the appropriation; but that is not a guaranty that it would not cost a greater amount before it is put into execution even on the face of the bill. The gentleman says that a bill has been introduced for the same purpose and is now before the committee.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will amend that by inserting "three" instead of "two."

The CHAIRMAN. That will not bring it within the rule. It is so clearly a change of the whole existing system of law, that the Chair can not entertain it. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For manufacture of stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and letter sheets, $1,150,000.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. It is an amendment that reduces the appropriation from $1,150,000 to $1,000,000, being a reduction of $150,000. I will state that the amendment is made at the request of the Postmaster-General, and after the amendment is read I will ask for the reading of a letter to me from the Postmaster-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 24 and 25, on page 5, by striking out the words "one hundred and fifty thousand;" so as to read: "one million dollars."

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Now, I will ask that the letter of the Postmaster-General be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 29, 1894.

SIR: Upon the opening of proposals yesterday for furnishing stamped envelopes to this Department for the four years beginning October 1, 1894, the prices offered were so much below those of the present contract as to warrant me in suggesting a reduction of the estimate heretofore submitted for the manufacture of those articles during the next fiscal year.

I have not yet made an award of the contract upon these proposals, but I have no doubt that I shall be able to make arrangements under them by which a saving to the Government of at least 12 per cent in the prices of all stamped envelopes to be furnished will be effected, amounting, it may be, to over half a million dollars during the contract term, but certainly justifying a reduction of $150,000 in the estimate referred to.

I have, accordingly, the honor to request that to the post-office appropriation bill now pending in the House of Representatives, an amendment be proposed by your committee reducing the item covering the manufacture of stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers from $1,150,000 to $1,000,000.

Yours, very respectfully,

W. S. BISSELL,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN S. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

For mail depredations and post-office inspectors, $300,000: Provided, That not exceeding $5,000 of this amount may be expended for fees to United States attorneys, marshals, clerks of courts, and special counsel necessarily employed in prosecuting civil suits instituted by the (Sixth) Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, through the Solicitor of the Treasury, against the sureties on the official bonds of late postmasters, as provided for by section 292, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 17 and 18, page 6, the words "three hundred thousand dollars," and insert "two hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment must necessarily commend itself to this House, as it has shown heretofore that it has been engaged in the work of economy in the reduction of expenditures in the various Departments. By looking at the appropriations the House can readily understand that a very large increase has been made this year in the item for post-office inspectors. Two years ago this Post-Office Committee, in substantially the same House, engaged in the same work, recommended an appropriation for this work, under a Republican Administration, of $200,000. The Senate did subsequently increase that amount to $235,000, but now, when we come into a Democratic Administration, and this money is to be expended under a Democratic Administration, it seems that the committee have turned from the line of strict economy to what might be termed ruthless extravagance.

This is properly known in the Post Office Department, Mr. Chairman, as the "slush fund." The committee have increased the amount $65,000 over the appropriations of last year. Of course that will provide places for from fifty to sixty good Democrats. I suppose that will commend itself to a great extent to the favorable consideration of this House, but I think when you come to investigate this matter carefully from all its standpoints you will find that it is too great an increase in one year. The amounts appropriated heretofore have varied from $200,000 to $235,000.

Now, I desire once more to call your attention to this matter. You have cut some of these appropriations to the extent of a million and a half of dollars; you have cut these items which must necessarily be carried out by the Government, and for such contracts as must be carried out by the Government, but here, where you have an item in which it is discretionary with the Department as to whether they employ these extra inspectors or not, you make a ruthless expenditure of the people's money. Of course if this House is unwarranted in extravagant appropriations I could hardly recommend it; but if you are honestly engaged in that work of retrenchment of expenditures which you have held out to the country so constantly and insistently, I ask you to adopt the amendment that I have proposed, which gives an increase of $15,000 over the amount appropriated last year.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The increase in this item is made at the special request of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, and he says it is absolutely necessary for a due administration of the law that the amount of $300,000 should be appropriated for the next fiscal year. I admit that that is an increase over what has usually been given, but it is not much of an increase over what has been sometimes appropriated. In 1888, for instance, the amount appropriated was $300.000. That was under a Democratic Administration. In 1891 the amount was $250,000. That was under a Republican Administration. In 1892 the amount was $270,000. That was under a Republican Administration.

Mr. LOUD. And made by a Republican Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes; it was under a Republican Administration and made by a Republican Congress. The $300,000 in 1888 was under a Democratic Administration and was made by a Democratic Congress. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to go into the details of this matter, but I would like to have printed in the RECORD the reasons submitted by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General for making this appropriation, and with the permission of the House I will incorporate them in my remarks.

The following is taken from the report to this House of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, February 27, 1894:

38. Mail depredations and post-office inspectors.—The amount asked for is $300,000. The committee recommends $300,000. For a series of years the appropriations have been—

1887	200,000.00
1888	300,000.00
1889	200,000.00
1890	200,000.00
1891	250,000.00
1892	270,000.00
1893	235,000.00
1894	235,000.00

The expenditures have been—

1885	$199,986.25
1886	195,894.62
1887	198,219.75
1888	292,137.82
1889	198,272.93
1890	198,997.53
1891	243,109.85

Under section 4020 of the Revised Statutes post-office inspectors employed in the money-order service are paid out of the proceeds of the money-order business. The expenditure for such service for the year 1891 amounted to $57,441.93; for the year 1892 it amounted to $58,630.05, and for the year 1893, $57,862.54. This is in addition to the ordinary expenditure.

The following statement, furnished by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, shows the annual appropriations for mail depredations and post-office inspectors from the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, to the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894, inclusive; and also the several amounts paid to post-office inspectors during said period from the appropriations for the free-delivery service, and from the proceeds of the money-order business.

Year.	Annual appropriation mail depredations and post-office inspectors.	Paid from appropriation free-delivery service.	Paid from proceeds of money-order business.	Surplus.	Deficiency.
1885	$200,000	$7,748.18	$26,628.51	$13.75
1886	200,000	8,847.71	29,399.41		$1,224.82
1887	200,000	11,336.12	35,752.03	1,780.25
1888	300,000	15,156.20	30,575.47	7,862.18
1889	200,000	27,394.82	41,931.27	1,727.07
1890	200,000	26,440.00	50,845.12	567.47
1891	250,000	27,776.91	57,441.93	2,534.12
1892	270,000	12,068.87	58,639.05		10,565.00
1893	235,000		57,862.54	1.33
1894	235,000

The sum of $5,000 from the annual appropriation for "mail depredations and post-office inspectors" is applicable for the payment of the fees of United States attorneys and marshals.

By direction of the Postmaster-General the payment of inspectors from the appropriation for the free-delivery service was discontinued from and after December 1, 1891.

The aggregate amounts paid as rewards for the arrest and conviction of mail robbers for the respective years are as follows:

1889	808.00
1890	8,000.00
1891	3,500.00
1892	10,500.00

Claims aggregating $3,500 for rewards earned during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1893, have already been stated up for a deficiency appropriation. Incomplete claims amounting to $3,000 or $4,000 for rewards earned during the same years are still pending approval in this Department.

The claims for reward represented nearly the entire amount of the deficiency for the fiscal year of 1892, for which an appropriation was made by Congress in February, 1893.

Statement showing the necessity for and benefits to be derived from the increased appropriation asked for post-office inspectors and mail depredations ($300,000).

At no time during the last ten years has the appropriation for this purpose been less than $200,000. It should be remembered that the service grows every year in all its branches. Its needs multiply with the increase of population and the demands of advancing civilization. That the postal service is a business enterprise of vast proportions needs no demonstration at this time. The wonderful development of the service, the corresponding increase of labor entailed upon the division of post-office inspectors and mail depredations may be best realized by a comparison of official statistics for a period covering the last ten years.

The records of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, show that there was a total of 2,143 Presidential post-offices, while the total number of offices of this class in 1893 was 3,360, an increase of over 56 per cent. The total number of post-offices of all classes in 1883 was 47,863, while the total number of post-offices of all classes in 1893 was 68,403, an increase in number of 20,540, or 41 per cent.

The total revenues of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, amounted to $45,508,692, while the total revenues for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1893, amounted to $75,896,933, an increase of $30,388,241, or more than 66 per cent.

The total number of star routes in 1883 was 11,327, and the total number in 1893 was 18,659, an increase in numbers of 7,332, or 64 per cent. The total number of railway post-office routes in 1883 was 330, and the total number in 1893 was 2,529, an increase in numbers of 1,699, or 200 per cent. The total number of railway post-office clerks employed in 1883 was 3,487, and the total number employed in 1893 was 6,645, an increase in number of 3,158, or 90 per cent.

The total number of free-delivery offices in operation in 1883 was 154, and the total number in operation in 1893 was 699, an increase in number of 555, or 360 per cent.

It will be readily understood that this wonderful growth in the postal service has carried with it a corresponding increase of demands for the services of post-office inspectors. The proportion of this increase is indicated in the following table:

Work referred to post-office inspectors and completed, and arrests made, etc.

Year.	Cases referred.	Cases completed.	Arrests made.	Convictions.	Awaiting trial.
1893	90,935	93,091	1,181	406	605

While the force of post-office inspectors employed during the fiscal year 1893 was only 6 per cent greater than for 1883, there was an increase of 90 per cent in the total number of cases referred, and an increase of 105 per cent in the total number of cases completed. But, notwithstanding the services rendered, there were 26,708 cases in the hands of inspectors awaiting investigation on June 30, 1893. It will also be observed that the total number of arrests has increased 108 per cent, and the total number of convictions 46½ per cent.

It would not appear that additional argument was necessary to show that the present force of post-office inspectors is inadequate to perform the services required of them. The importance of the work performed by the division of post-office inspectors and mail depredations is not secondary to that of any other branch of the public service. This division is charged with the preparation, issue, and investigation of all cases relating to depredations upon the mails and losses therein, including complaints and inquiries relating to mail matter passing between the United States and foreign countries, and across the territory of the United States from one foreign country to another. The beneficial results of these services extend to every business interest and individual in the country.

The last annual report of the Postmaster-General shows that the collections made for that year through the division of post-office inspectors (C cases) amounted to $148,267.39, a trifle over 63 per cent of the entire amount ($235,000) appropriated for said division. There was also collected by the inspectors from mail thieves, and for losses occurring through the carelessness of postal employés during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1893, the sum of $11,753.84, and during the same year there was disbursed to the rightful owners the sum of $10,585.61 from the money recovered as above stated.

From the foregoing it will appear that there is a direct and important financial benefit accruing to the Government continually as the result of the services performed by post-office inspectors. The thefts and general depredations which are averted in consequence of the constant surveillance of this force over the great army of postal employés deserves full consideration.

The moral effect of the services rendered by post-office inspectors upon the service generally can not be too highly estimated. If this force was withdrawn from the service there would be no check or limit to the depredations upon all classes of mail matter. There is no branch of the public service that is of greater importance, that is actually nearer to the people, or that is as useful and necessary to all as the postal service. Every American believes in the absolute sanctity of the seal, and it is the sworn and constant duty of the post-office inspector to see that this constitutional guaranty of the people is not violated.

Among the important duties of the inspector is that of instructing new postmasters and employés in the postal laws and regulations and the usages of the service. Such instructions prevent errors and avert losses, and thus a greater good is done the service than would result from the subsequent labor necessary to locate losses and fix responsibility.

With the present limited force of inspectors important work is constantly postponed, if not omitted entirely, simply because it is impossible for the same men to be in two places at the same time. Inspectors engaged in one line of work are repeatedly called away and interrupted to take up some matter of an entirely different nature which the Department considers special and urgent; this, too, not infrequently when they are engaged on depredation work, which requires time, patience, and skill to achieve success, remove cause for complaints, and detect a dishonest employé or other depredator.

The matter of the inspection of all post-offices is another line of duty of the greatest importance to the general service. With the present limited force it is only possible to inspect the larger offices and such others as demand attention on account of shortages or other irregularities. With a sufficient force of inspectors to undertake the work of general inspection of all offices, a great proportion of such shortages and irregularities would be corrected in their incipiency, if not altogether avoided.

The total number of post-offices at the close of the last fiscal year was 68,403. It is manifestly impossible for the force of inspectors to closely watch all of these offices or to be upon the ground immediately after a burglary has been committed. This would be true even if the force were increased to the limit possible with an appropriation of $300,000; hence the necessity for a special appropriation of $25,000 for rewards for the arrest and conviction of post-office burglars and highway mail robbers.

There has been a steady increase in the number of post-offices burglarized during several years past. This is particularly true of fourth-class offices. They are generally located in a store in a small village, or even more exposed in the country, and are particularly tempting to the lawless, as affording much better opportunity for ill-gotten spoils than the larger offices or banking establishments in cities, which are ordinarily watched and guarded, while the former have no protection except that afforded by ordinary locks.

The local police authorities appear to have a general opinion that the robbery of a United States post-office is no concern of theirs, and that such matters properly come under the jurisdiction of the United States courts and officials. It is also generally understood that the loss resulting from a robbery is sustained by the Government and not by the postmaster, and this consideration has a tendency to make local authorities less zealous in their endeavors to pursue and arrest criminals of this class. The offer of a small reward for the arrest and conviction of post-office burglars would spur local officers to an active pursuit of these offenders, and would undoubtedly result in the capture and conviction of a large majority of them.

Police officers have stated that if they had the least assurance that even their actual expenses would have been paid, they would have made vigorous efforts to apprehend burglars of this class, but feeling that they would be compelled to incur personal expense in the pursuit of an offender against the United States statutes, they have preferred to leave such pursuits to United States officers. There can be no question but that the offering of a reward will act as an incentive to a better effort on the part of the police, private detectives, and others, and we could also doubtless secure valuable information from confederates if we were able to hold out some substantial inducement, such as a reward.

Attention is called to the increase in the number of post-office burglaries reported in the last ten years. The number reported for the fiscal year 1883 was 468; the number reported for the year 1893 was 1,195, an increase in number of 727, or more than 64 per cent. Although 1,195 burglaries were reported last year only 228 arrests were effected, which is certainly a very small percentage. It is believed that the offering of a small reward would more than double the number of arrests of this class.

The recent frequent and bold train robberies are familiar to every reader of the daily papers, and the Post-Office Department is constantly in receipt of telegrams announcing the robbery of post-offices in every section of the country. It is believed that Congress will feel, as does the Postmaster-General, that the public service would be greatly benefited by the appropriation of the sum of $25,000 to be expended in rewards as herein indicated, and that the Government would be fully compensated by the results secured.

R. A. MAXWELL,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

ARREST OF POST-OFFICE DEPREDATORS.

The inspectors' force of the Post-Office Department has made a most creditable showing during the month of January, 1894. In the prosecution of its duties of investigating complaints of losses and depredations in the ordinary and registered mail, and of all irregularities in connection with the postal service, a total of 145 arrests were made during the month. Of this number 6 were postmasters, 5 assistant postmasters, 8 post-office clerks, 3 letter carriers, 6 mail carriers, and 1 special-delivery messenger, making 29 employés of the service. Of the remaining 116, 85 were arrested for various offenses against the postal laws and regulations, such as evasions of customs duties and postage rates, lottery schemes, and the use of the mails for fraudulent enterprises, while 31 of the arrested persons were post-office burglars, some of them being of the most desperate and daring class. During the last fiscal year only 134 arrests were made of offenders of the class last mentioned. It will appear, therefore, that professional post-office burglary is decidedly on the increase, probably due to some extent to the great army of the unemployed.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. LOUD, and it was rejected—ayes 12, noes 55.

The Clerk read as follows, concluding the reading of the bill:

SEC. 3. That if the revenue of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, a sum equal to such deficiency of the revenues of said Department is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply said deficiencies in the revenue for the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1895.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a new section, to come in at the end of the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of the bill on page 7, a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 4. That all publications purporting to be issued periodically and to subscribers, but which are merely books or reprints of books, whether they be issued complete or in parts, whether they be bound or unbound, or whether they be sold by subscription or otherwise, when offered for transmission by mail shall be subject to postage at the rates prescribed for third-class matter.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that until I hear an explanation of it.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will say that this is exactly the language of a bill introduced by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], and favorably reported to the House by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads—I believe, unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. How does it change the present law?

Mr. DINGLEY. What will be the effect of it?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The effect of it will be to stop the transmission at the cheap rate of periodical publications in the form of books, novels, and matter of that sort, that are now going through the mails in such enormous quantities at 1 cent per pound.

Mr. Wanamaker, when he was Postmaster-General, recommended this change, and Postmaster-General Bissell also recommends it.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is the same proposition that has been heretofore recommended by the Department?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes, sir; for a good many years.

Mr. PICKLER. Does it increase the postage on magazines?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. No; it does not interfere with them at all, and it does not interfere in any way with the amendment adopted the other day in regard to fraternal and industrial journals.

Mr. PICKLER. On what kind of publications does it increase the postage?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Publications in the form of periodical books which pass through the mails as if they were journals or monthly magazines, such as the Seaside novels and many other such like publications.

Mr. PICKLER. The Chautauqua Magazine—would that be included?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Oh, no; it does not touch the magazines.

Mr. LOUD. There are papers published in this country which send out every month with their own publications a Seaside novel or some other cheap form of publication, and they all go through the mails at the cheap rate.

Mr. QUIGG. Why should they not go through the mails?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Well, school books, prayer books, Bibles, and other good books have to pay 8 cents a pound, and I think these other publications or periodical books ought to pay the same.

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand, the class of publications to which the gentleman refers often includes the best literature.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Sometimes; but school books and prayer books and Bibles have to pay 8 cents a pound, and I do not see why these other books should be carried any cheaper. The following report, No. 513, made by me to the House from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, March 1, 1894, will explain the reasons why the change proposed is desirable:

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 5188):

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5188) to fix the rate of postage on periodical publications containing the print of reprint books, submitted the following report:

A bill of like character passed the House of Representatives, Fiftieth Congress, and Mr. Blount, of Georgia, submitted the following report:

"That under the act of March 3, 1879, second-class matter embraces newspapers and other periodical publications which are issued at stated intervals as frequently as four times a year.

"The object of Congress, as shown by the debates, was to provide for newspapers and periodicals. By virtue of an opinion of the Attorney-General almost anything in the nature of a book, provided it be without substantial binding, may be admitted to the mails at second-class rate of postage.

"The Third Assistant Postmaster-General, in his report, on pages 901 and 902 of the report of the Postmaster-General, presents correctly the abuses grown up under that construction very fully, as follows:

"'Under the law the conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the second class of mail matter are as follows:

"'(1) It must regularly be issued at stated intervals as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively.

"'(2) It must be issued from a known office of publication.

"'(3) It must be formed of printed sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

"'4. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates. (Act of March 3, 1879, section 14, 20 Statutes, 359.)

"'Under these conditions—which were intended to distinguish what are generally known as newspapers and periodicals from books—it may be demonstrated that almost anything in the nature of a book, provided it be without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, may be brought within the privileges of the second-class rate of postage, and the object of the law accordingly defeated.

"'Let it be supposed, for example, that a publisher wishes to issue the works of Shakspeare in such a way as to secure the privilege of the pound-rate of postage when the book is sent in the mails. Every one knows that such a publication is a book, no matter how it may be published; it is certainly not a newspaper or a periodical in the universally accepted sense of these words. The publisher, however, means to have it admitted as such, so he arranges to issue it monthly, giving each part a number and a date, places upon the title-page a statement of the place of publication, and binds the parts in paper covers. He thus easily complies with three of the above-mentioned conditions. Next, he publishes a prospectus in which the publication is claimed to be devoted to literature, and he secures through his agents subscribers to the work, in this way complying with the fourth condition of the law.

"'It must not be supposed that this is merely a hypothetical case. Instances of this exact character have occurred. The postmaster at New York has called attention to the fact that a dictionary—nothing more or less—issued in this way, was passed through the mails at the pound rate of postage. Not only this, but tons upon tons of books called "Libraries" or "Series"—being purely and simply paper-covered books or reprints of books, having, probably, no list of subscribers other than book-sellers, who buy them just as they buy other books—are every day going through the mails as second-class matter. And the number is constantly on the increase. Unless a check is put to this abuse there is no telling to what extent it will go. Already the mailing of matter of this character together with pretended sample copies of publications, reference to which is made hereafter, has become so great that the intelligent and careful handling of it at many offices is impossible; so that there is little doubt that a great deal of matter unquestionably subject to a higher rate of postage is constantly smuggled through the mails as second-class matter.

"'I can not believe that the law was ever intended to allow this class of literature—some of it of very questionable value—to go through the mails at the rate of a cent a pound, while the Bible, the school book—every other good book that reputable publishers issue under its true character—has to bear postage at the rate of 8 cents a pound.

"'As a remedy for the evil I suggest the passage by Congress of the following:

"'That hereafter no publications shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter that are but books or reprints of books, whether they be issued complete or in parts, whether they be bound or unbound, or whether they be sold by subscription or otherwise.'

"To admit all books at second-class rates would involve an immense loss of revenue, not deemed desirable at this time.

"The deficiency in revenue is now over $2,000,000. If this promises soon to disappear, it is believed more desirable to reduce the rates of postage on first-class matter. This would be of advantage to all of our citizens, instead of to a limited class, as illustrated by the citations from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

"The Postmaster-General in his report pages 43, 44, 45, and 46, for 1888, submits the following:

"DEFECTS OF LAW GOVERNING SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

"The press has become the leading contributor to the volume of the mails. The specially favored class are newspapers and periodical publications issued by known offices of publication and sent by publishers or news agents to regular subscribers or news agents. These are designated as second-class matter, and postage is chargeable at 1 cent per pound. When circulated within the county of publication, this matter is entitled to transmission free of postage. The total quantity of second-class matter carried in the mails during the last fiscal year was about 95,000 tons, of which upward of 14,000 tons were sent free of postage. The receipts from second-class matter amounted to $1,616,351.27, or only 2.9 per cent of the entire postal revenue.

"The class next in favor are books, circulars, and other miscellaneous printed matter. These are styled third-class matter; and they are subject to a charge for postage of 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof. To realize the benefit of the cheaper rate of postage a fertility of expedients has been developed to evade the law and to secure the admission to the second class of matter which properly belongs to the third class. The success attending such efforts may be indicated by the fact that during the past three years the average annual rate of increase of revenue from second-class matter was 13.7 per cent, as against an average annual increase of 8.17 per cent in the remainder of the postal revenue, derived in the greatest part from postages on the other classes of matter. The effects are not only hurtful to the postal revenue, but they are opposed to the interests of legitimate journalism. The principal evils calling for a remedy are the following:

"MAILING OF BOOKS AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

"The revenue suffers a serious loss through the evasion of the law by which certain publishers secure admission to the mails as second-class matter of paper-covered volumes issued in complete form as books, but under the semblance of periodical publications. Through this evasion carriage is secured at 1 cent per pound, instead of 1 cent for each 2 ounces, the rate for third-class matter, to which class the books in question properly belong. The means by which this is effected is a nominal compliance with the conditions of the law governing the admission of publications to the second class, which conditions are substantially as follows:

"1. That the publication shall be issued periodically not less than four times a year, shall bear date of issue, and be numbered consecutively.

"2. That it must be issued from a known office of publication.

"3. That it must be printed on sheets of paper, and be not bound in cloth, leather, or other substantial binding.

"4. That it must be originated and issued for the dissemination of information of a general character, or in the interests of literature, science, art, or some special industry.

"5. That it must have a legitimate list of subscribers.

"6. That it shall not be designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

"The precise manner in which these conditions are complied with is shown by the following examples, which are parallelisms of cases actually occurring: A publisher in Boston makes application to the Department for the admission to the mails as second-class matter of what he terms the 'Blank Library,' stating in the form of application that the library is to be issued quarterly; that it is to be devoted to the science of law; and that it has a bona fide list of subscribers; and he submits, as the first number of the library, 'Story's Conflict of Laws,' so entitled and headed throughout, but bearing an extra title-page and a stiff paper cover, containing the designation 'Blank Library, No. 1, volume 1,' the date of issue, the office of publication, and the price of subscription. Upon this showing of facts the Blank Library is entered as second-class matter, and the publisher continues his issue with 'Adams on Equity,' 'Sharswood's Blackstone,' and any other law books that he may, for the time being, find it profitable to issue in this way. It may be well to say that these books are all so prepared that the purchaser can have them bound in the customary law binding at his pleasure, without any mutilation of them.

"Another publisher in New York, desiring to issue a series of novels, adopts as a general designation of them the 'Blank Series,' devoted to literature, makes application in the same way as the law publisher, gets the series entered as second-class matter, and then goes on to issue a multitude of books of fiction, differing in no respect from other paper-covered books, except that they are designated the 'Blank Series,' and bear a number and date of issue, besides professing to be issued to regular subscribers. With regard to this latter point there is some room for doubt as to whether any of these libraries or series have a bona fide list of subscribers; that is to say, subscribers who send in the subscription price for a year or any part of a year, except that comprehended by a single issue of the publication, the publisher very probably counting as subscribers retail dealers who buy of him just as they buy of other publishers, without any reference to regular subscription. I have some reason to believe, too, that there is little or no regularity in the issue of the publications; the publisher in reality suiting his own convenience as to the frequency of issue after he gets the publication officially entered.

"This practice has, it seems, been in existence some nine or ten years, beginning, I understand, with a few publishers who mailed but a comparatively small number of books, and increasing year by year until the number of publishers availing themselves of the looseness of the law and its very liberal interpretation by the Department is now very considerable. These publishers represent nearly all the great cities of the country, and they mail annually an astounding aggregation of books. It must be borne in mind, also, that not only are these books mailed as periodicals in the first instance from the publishing house, but they are transmitted over and over again through the mails by newsdealers throughout the country, every one of whom is entitled to mail at the same rate as the publisher.

"I am well satisfied that this practice involves a gross abuse of the law, which beyond all question never could have been intended to admit to the mails at a cent a pound the 'Adventures of Claude Duval,' merely because it purports to be a part of some series or pretended series of books and bears a paper cover, while 'Butler's Analogy,' or 'Newton's Principia,' or 'Webster's Spelling Book,' is chargeable with postage at eight times that rate because bound in cloth and issued without alleged connection with any other works.

"Besides its illegality it brings about an unfair discrimination against publishers whose convenience does not allow the issue of single works at stated periods, or whose conscience, or good taste, or whatever else may be the animating motive, will not allow them to resort to this class of business to benefit themselves at the expense of the Government.

"If it be asked why, feeling as I do concerning this, I have allowed it to continue, and even to increase, the answer is that the length of time the practice has lasted gives it some claim to recognition, and that the great number of additions to it officially authorized before my entrance into office prevents the exclusion of new claimants without manifest unfairness. Under all the circumstances I feel it to be only proper that I should present the case and urgently ask that Congress be called upon to provide a remedy."

In letter under date of March 7, 1890, Postmaster-General Wanamaker thus addressed the chairman of Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, who reported favorably a similar bill to the House during the first session of the Fifty-first Congress:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 7, 1890.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of a letter, dated the 6th instant, * * * transmitting a copy of bill H. R. 7558, applying the third-class rate of postage to books issued in the guise of periodicals.

After a careful consideration of the purpose and phraseology of this bill, I am convinced that it needs no alteration, but that in its present form it should be favorably reported by your committee; and I respectfully recommend that that be done, and that such further steps be taken as will tend to secure its early passage by the House of Representatives.

The wrong which the bill is intended to remedy I need not now discuss; my annual report to the President presents fully my views concerning it, and to them I respectfully direct your attention. But I may not inappropriately add that since that report was written the experience of the Department has been such as to fully justify everything that was therein said relative to the evil, and to satisfy me that it is a growing one deserving of prompt attention.

Yours, very respectfully, etc.,

JNO. WANAMAKER,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. HENRY H. BINGHAM,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives."

The following letter from the Postmaster-General is herewith made a part of this report:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1894.

SIR: In response to the request contained in your letter of the 24th instant, I have the honor to submit the following as my views upon bill H. R. 5188, 'To fix the rate of postage on periodical publications containing the print or the reprint of books.'

Under the practice that now prevails, paper-covered books and pamphlets, issued periodically and numbered and dated, are allowed to be transmitted in the mails at a cent a pound—the rate prescribed by law for newspapers and periodicals—instead of a cent for every 2 ounces, which is the rate fixed for matter of the third class.

Just when this practice originated I do not know; nor apparently have several of my predecessors been able to state precisely its origin. Its incipiency was probably connected with some seemingly meritorious case—a single work, perhaps, issued in parts or numbers, and presenting the outward characteristics of a periodical—where, no one at the time looking upon the matter as one of importance, the benefit of the doubt, if any, was given to the publisher. This was, of course, followed as a precedent in all similar cases, and these by others less meritorious, until finally, in 1877, the publishers of a magazine known as the Lakeside Library, in which sometimes complete novels were issued as entire numbers, claimed the right of having it go through the mails as a periodical, and this claim, under an opinion of Attorney-General Devens, was allowed. After that entire books with none of the real characteristics of magazines or periodicals were offered and accepted as periodicals, and the present condition of things was inaugurated.

Whatever may have been the foundation and history of the practice, however, and no matter how long it may have existed, it has so grown that the quantity of matter now mailed under it is enormous, involving immense labor in handling it, with a corresponding expense for employés and transportation, and a loss to the postal revenue of somewhere near $1,000,000 a year.

It seems to me absolutely necessary that this evil, for such it is, should be suppressed; and as the bill submitted by your committee proposes an effectual means of doing this—by relegating to the third class of mail matter all books now sent under the newspaper rate of postage, whether they be issued entire or in parts, regularly or not, and regardless of whether they bear or not the unessential indicia of second-class matter—I am heartily in favor of its passage.

A few of the reasons that may be urged in support of this bill are these:

1. Under the law, all books are third-class matter, and therefore chargeable with postage, when mailed, at the rate of a cent for every 2 ounces or fraction thereof. To allow those that now go at the second-class rate of a cent a pound to retain this great privilege is in violation of the spirit of the law.

2. There is no good ground for regarding the books in question as periodicals. It is in fact absurd to call them by this designation. They are simply books, known universally as such among purchasers and publishers, with seldom more than a nominal list of subscribers, devoted to nothing in particular, and in many cases issued irregularly. But for the fact that the subject now properly comes under the jurisdiction of Congress, I should myself rule them out under the discretion which the law seems to confer upon me relative to the entry into the mails of second-class matter.

3. The books that now go through the mails under the practice in question are generally not of a high class of literature. They are largely works of fiction, and many of them are of a very low order, both in a moral and an intellectual sense. Besides, three-fourths of them are probably of foreign authorship. It would seem, therefore, that their continuance in the enjoyment of an exceptional privilege in the mails is in the interest neither of morality nor good taste, and certainly not encouraging to the growth of healthy home literature.

5. To give these paper-covered books a privilege which bound books do not have is without reason. If there should be any discrimination at all it ought to be in favor of the good book, which is usually put up so that it will be preserved, rather than the poor one, which is generally covered with paper and has but an ephemeral existence.

(6) The evil involved in the practice under discussion is constantly growing. Not only are publishers of paper-covered books increasing their output under the usual methods of business, but newspaper publishers all over the country are lending themselves, in one way or another, to the circulation of this class of literature. The publisher of a daily newspaper in Chicago, who lately circulated immense numbers of these books under what has come to be known as the "newspaper coupon" system, now announces a further distribution of 1,600,000 volumes. Other newspaper publishers are of course doing likewise, some of them to quite as great an extent. With not a few, the distribution of the books seems to be a part of the scheme of issuing the papers.

It might be said that the Post-Office Department itself can, to some extent at least, prevent the increase of the evil by refusing to admit any additional or new issues of these books to the cent-a-pound rate of postage. But this could hardly be done with fairness. As long as the many series of books that are now in continue to be treated as second-class matter, new ones of like character must be given similar treatment. The proper course to pursue is to exclude them all as periodicals and charge them hereafter with third-class postage.

Yours, very respectfully,

W. S. BISSELL, Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. S. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. It seems to me that if the House is rising to a high standard of morality and wants to cut off some of the trashy novels that are circulated among the people it ought not, at the same time, to cut off the better class of literature.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Well, it is not possible to provide for everything by a general law. And there is no reason why these books should pass through the mails at 1 cent a pound, when it costs the Government 8 cents a pound to carry them.

Mr. PICKLER. For instance, if any house is publishing Dickens or Scott or other such standard works I should like to have those works go through the mail as cheaply as possible.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Well, I suppose the other books to which I have referred and many others might go through the mails at the pound rate, but yet the Government can not afford to carry them all at the cheapest rate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine withdraw his point of order?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not insist upon the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have printed in the RECORD the report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads relating to the section just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be printed as a part of the gentleman's remarks on that amendment. The Clerk will now report the section of the bill passed over by unanimous consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Springfield, Mass., via New York and Washington, to Atlanta and New Orleans, $196,614.22: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Mr. KYLE. I now offer the amendment which I submitted a few days ago for the information of the House.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. KYLE, as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 23, 24, and 25, on page 4, and lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, on page 5.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the committee, unanimous consent being given thereto, this paragraph was passed over and general debate closed on the remainder of the bill. This paragraph is now open for general debate.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, an item of this kind has been in seventeen different appropriation bills. The first appropriation was made in 1878 and it has been continued consecutively down to 1894. I will publish the amount of these several appropriations without now reading the figures:

Appropriation for special facilities.

1878	$150,000.00	1887	221,000.00
1879	125,000.00	1888	205,987.00
1880	150,000.00	1889	205,987.00
1881	350,000.00	1890	205,055.58
1882	425,000.00	1891	205,421.79
1883	600,000.00	1892	196,614.22
1884	185,000.00	1893	196,614.22
1885	230,000.00	1894	196,614.22
1886	266,764.00

The appropriation for the current year is $196,614.22; but a year ago the item was changed somewhat so as to provide that this appropriation should be made for lines from Springfield, Mass., via New York and Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans. Now, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] stated in the course of his remarks the other day, as I understood him, that under this provision mail facilities have not been expedited in any way, that there are no better mail facilities to-day on account of this appropriation than there were one year ago; and he went on to say that the schedule time between New York and New Orleans had absolutely been reduced ten minutes.

The gentleman, unfortunately for the House and unfortunately for himself, omitted to tell the committee that there has been an entirely new fast mail train put on, which goes all the way from New York to New Orleans. That was not alluded to. Now, I wish to call attention to the fact that while the Postmaster-General has not in direct terms made any recommendation about this appropriation, yet on page 19 of his last annual report he alludes to this identical fast mail, and to no other fast Southern mail. Here is what he says:

The fast mail service between the North and the South has recently been much enlarged. Following the coast line, its extent and rapidity will (commencing with December) be more complete than heretofore; and by means of the interior lines, it has recently been made possible to inaugurate a double daily fast mail service connecting the great business centers of the North with New Orleans, by way of Atlanta and Montgomery. The hours of these trains are those most preferred by the Department, and it has thereby been rendered possible to accomplish connections which provide equally well for both letter and daily newspaper mails.

There is not a syllable in this language of the Postmaster-General that does not refer to the fast mails which have been made possible by this special appropriation. The allusion there to the coast line is not the coast-line companies but to the railroads which by reason of this appropriation have made fast mail facilities possible.

What has been the advantage of the new facilities? One year ago on the coast line there was a fast mail train leaving New York at 4:20 in the morning and going over the coast-line roads by Washington, Richmond, Charleston, and down to Jacksonville and to Tampa.

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi says those coast-line companies are giving to the Government and the people better mail facilities—better facilities for letter mail and for newspaper mail—than they did a year ago. What is the fact? The truth is that after the coast-line companies relinquished this appropriation a year ago they changed their schedules, and instead of leaving New York at 4:20 in the morning so that they could carry out the newspaper mail, they left at 9:30 in the morning, and they now leave at that hour, reaching Jacksonville, Fla., at 1:35 in the afternoon, four hours and fifteen minutes later than the Richmond and Danville fast mail train.

And the very same mail that these coast-line companies carried one year ago—the very same Florida mail—is carried now from New York via Washington and over the Richmond and Danville and its connections to Florida, much sooner than the coast line companies carry the mail to Florida points. The Richmond and Danville train gets to Jacksonville by its present schedule at 9:20 in the morning. The coast-line trains do not get there until 1:35 in the afternoon, or four hours and fifteen minutes later.

Mr. KYLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will.

Mr. KYLE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the train running through from New York to New Orleans does not run upon a schedule ten minutes slower than it did before it received this appropriation or any part of it.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Now, I wish to say——

Mr. KYLE. Answer that question.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Is that all the gentleman wants answered?

Mr. KYLE. That is one question.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I was going to say there are now two schedules——

Mr. KYLE. The gentleman says we have two trains; I expected such an answer, and I want to ask him this question—whether this second train does not make the run in forty-nine hours instead of thirty-nine hours, which it formerly took to make the trip from New York to New Orleans before they got this appropriation?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will state the facts about those two trains. The gentleman stated positively to the House that there were no additional mail facilities by reason of these special appropriations, and he omitted to tell the House and the country that there was a new fast train that left New York in the morning at 4:30 o'clock and carried the through mail to the extreme southern coast of Florida and to New Orleans.

Mr. KYLE. Now, if the gentleman will permit an interruption, my statement was that it did not facilitate the mail; that the train did not move faster now than it did before, and to that statement I adhere.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The gentleman, I think, will hardly adhere to that statement. How is it, or what is the effect of it, if it does not facilitate the mails? You have two trains instead of one, to begin with. I can show you exactly from the schedule here what the time is and how the mails are expedited.

Mr. SWANSON. Let me ask the gentleman if they are not run entirely under the orders of the Post-Office Department, to make mail connections? That is my understanding of it.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Both of these trains from New York to New Orleans have to run according to schedules that are made by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. LOUD. So does every train that carries the mail.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. No, sir; you can not show that.

Mr. LOUD. Yes, I can.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The gentleman can not show it.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must request gentlemen to preserve order on the floor. The gentleman from North Carolina is entitled to proceed without interruption. It is impossible for the officers of the House—the reporters—to perform their duties in the midst of such confusion. The Chair must insist, if gentlemen want to interrupt a gentleman occupying the floor to ask questions, that they must proceed in an orderly manner under the rule to do so.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has already yielded to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I was only waiting for the Chair to subside until I could get an opportunity to address the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if what you call "additional mail facilities" appropriated for in this bill is not a subsidy? If it is not a subsidy, what would you call it? I want to have some information on that point.

Mr. WASHINGTON. It is pay for service done.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I decline to allow the gentleman from Tennessee to interrupt me without asking consent of the Chair. [Laughter.] I hope the Chair will protect me in my right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I want to know why gentlemen are so suddenly in favor of subsidy. What has caused the change? I want to get one out West for additional mail facilities myself.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The gentleman from Washington wants to know if this is not a subsidy. I answer him by telling him that in my judgment the railroad companies carrying these mails by order and under contract with the Post-Office Department earn every cent that is given them for the expedition of the mails over their road.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. But is it a subsidy? That is the question.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. In my opinion it is not a subsidy; but suppose even that it were a subsidy. Does the gentleman want to take away this little pittance that gives the people of the Southern States fast mail facilities? The gentleman said nothing of the "subsidy" in this bill of a million dollars to the steamship companies—neither he nor any other gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Why do you not provide that these additional facilities shall be general?

Mr. WASHINGTON. I call the gentleman to order. He has not addressed the Chair to get permission.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I took that for granted.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The appropriation is made in this bill for steamship "subsidies" for carrying the foreign mails, and they are called "subsidies," but they are made in pursuance of the law by the Post-Office Committee. It was the duty of that committee to recommend the appropriations under the law. And I say to the gentleman that it is the very same thing in regard to these special mail facilities. The appropriations for them are continual under the law. They have been in the Post-Office appropriation bill for seventeen years. This will be the eighteenth time. At one time, for the year 1883, the appropriation ran away up as high as $600,000. We have cut it down now as low as $196,614.22. Two years ago the same committee, of which I was chairman, reported a reduction of this item to the amount of nearly a hundred thousand dollars.

I have been trying to show the benefit of these mail facilities, and I say that by means thereof there are two fast through mail trains for newspaper mail and for letter mail from New York to New Orleans. There are also two fast daily mail trains from New York to Tampa, Fla. So, as compared with the facilities of one year ago, under former appropriations, the present appropriation is accomplishing for the people at least four times as much.

Mr. COOMBS. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes; I would like to answer any question.

Mr. COOMBS. I would like to ask the gentleman for information. Does the Postmaster-General recommend this appropriation?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I have read exactly what he said.

Mr. COOMBS. I can not discover that he does recommend it. How, then, does it get into the bill; by what influence?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will tell the gentleman that this appropriation has been in the bill for seventeen years, and it stays in because the additional facilities afforded are needed and desired by the people and the communities who receive the advantages the appropriation affords.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that the highest evidence that the Postmaster-General has approved this is that it was left discretionary with him whether he would utilize the appropriation or not, and he did it?

Mr. COOMBS. Oh, I do not suppose that is a good reason.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It ought to be a good reason.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. QUIGG. I should like to suggest, in reply to my colleague [Mr. COOMBS], that it is not necessary, in order that New York should have a fast mail service to the South, that the Postmaster-General should do any recommending. The fact that this committee have recommended it is sufficient for me, as a Representative from New York. [Applause.]

Mr. COOMBS. I do not think New York has anything in particular to do with this matter. I am not necessarily opposing it; but I know that when these matters come before appropriation committees they generally come from some authoritative source, and I want to know how this gets into this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I want to answer the gentleman, and I will answer frankly. This appropriation has been in this bill for seventeen years, and no chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads before me has ever had it stricken out, and it comes in exactly now as it has done heretofore.

Mr. COOMBS. Then it is a sort of habit.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Well, it is a habit that is sustained by the evidence that it is for the good of the service.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is a habit, like free delivery.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will state to the gentleman that one year ago the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], who is a most careful man, and who looks after appropriations as carefully as any man in this House, offered an amendment which provided that the Postmaster-General should not use this fund unless it was to promote the good of the service; and the Postmaster-General can not expend this fund unless he deems it necessary to promote the interest of the postal service. I hold in my hand and will have printed in the RECORD—I have not time to read them now—many of the contracts that were made by the Postmaster-General with the parties who are favored by this appropriation. The contracts themselves provide that if certain schedules are not maintained, and if certain connections are not made, that on ten days' notice the Postmaster-General shall have the right to revoke any of these contracts:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., October 2, 1893.

SIR: The act of Congress making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, contains the following paragraph:

"For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Springfield, Mass., via New York and Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $196,614.22: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service."

Acting under the authorization as above recited, the Postmaster-General has directed the assignment, from July 1, 1893, to June 30, 1894, of $142,716.25 per annum to the railroad mail carriers hereinbelow mentioned, with the understanding that at least two continuous daily mail train schedules having connection from the North, shall be maintained between Washington, D. C., and New Orleans, La., via Atlanta, Ga., which schedules shall be known as trains 35 and 37 over the Richmond and Danville system and their connections south of Atlanta, and with the further understanding that these schedules shall not, without the Post-Office Department's approval, be changed.

The payments will be made pro rata to the following routes:

Route.	Termini.	Miles.	Pay.
114002	Washington to Lynchburg	174.04	$21,755.00
114016	Lynchburg to North Danville	65.74	8,217.50
114036	North Danville to Charlotte	142.80	17,850.00
121001	Charlotte to Atlanta	267.71	33,463.75
121003	Atlanta to West Point	86.32	10,790.00
124001	West Point to Montgomery	86.40	10,800.00
124012	Montgomery to New Orleans	318.72	39,840.00
	Total		142,716.25

The Postmaster-General reserves to himself the right to modify, or discontinue altogether, the payments upon giving to the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company ten days' notice of such intention.

Yours, respectfully,

J. LOWRIE BELL,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Col. A. B. ANDREWS,
Vice-President Richmond and Danville Railroad Company and Agent for the Receivers, Raleigh, N. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
RAILWAY ADJUSTMENT DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., October 9, 1893.

SIR: The following is a copy of an order issued this day on route No. 114002, Washington, D. C., to Lynchburg, Va.:

"From July 1, 1893, to June 30, 1894, pay the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company, quarterly at the rate of $21,755 per annum, for maintaining special mail facilities, consisting of two daily fast mail trains between Washington, D. C., and Lynchburg, Va., in connection with the mail service from Springfield, Mass., via New York and Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, subject to future orders and to fines and deductions. Charge to appropriation for necessary and special facilities on trunk lines."

Similar orders have been issued on routes 114016, Lynchburg to Danville Junction (n. o.), allowing at the ratce of $8,317.50 per annum; 114038, Danville Junction (n. o.) to Charlotte, N. C., allowing at the rate of $17,850 per annum, and 121001, Atlanta, Ga., to Charlotte, N. C., allowing at the rate of $93,-468.75 per annum.

Very respectfully,

J. LOWRIE BELL,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

RICHMOND AND DANVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.
(Through Col. A. B. Andrews, Raleigh, N. C.)

CONCERNING THE SPECIAL FACILITY SERVICE DEDUCTIONS.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
WASHINGTON, D. C., October 24, 1893.

SIR: In connection with the allowance of $142,716.25 for special facilities between Washington and New Orleans, supplied by trains known as Richmond and Danville Nos. 35 and 37, you will be governed by the following:

Whenever the line between Washington and Atlanta accomplishes its connections, via Montgomery at Atlanta, it will be considered as having fulfilled the requirements of the Department. Failure to accomplish such connections will be ground for deducting the trip value of the extraordinary allowance.

In like manner, the line Atlanta to Montgomery and that from Montgomery to New Orleans will be treated independently, each interest being held accountable for its own portion of the through service.

The failure of No. 37 to accomplish at New Orleans the rail connection for Houston, Tex., via routes Nos. 149003, 149010, and 150012, known as train No. 20, at 9:30 a.m., will constitute a failure.

The fact of delay in leaving Washington, or elsewhere, has been caused by waiting for the connections can not be given weight by the Department if there is failure to accomplish the connections at Atlanta or beyond. The special allowance is extraordinary and specifically for the accomplishment of a special service, the failure of which is good ground for the deduction of the proportionate value of the service.

Yours, respectfully,

J. LOWRIE BELL,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. JOHN A. CHAPMAN,
Chief Division of Inspection, Post-Office Department.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 24, 1893.

SIR: Herewith I hand you three copies of the instructions issued the inspection division concerning the application of deductions from the special facility allowances between Washington and New Orleans via Atlanta.

Please acquaint your connections with the same.

Yours, respectfully,

J. LOWRIE BELL,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Col. A. B. ANDREWS,
Vice-President Richmond and Danville Railroad Company, and Agent of the Receivers, Raleigh, N. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., October 30, 1893.

DEAR SIR: Primarily the extraordinary compensation is allowed for the accomplishment of a continuous service to New Orleans, and it has been found difficult to modify the ruling which heretofore has prevailed whereby the failure to accomplish the continuous service required the deduction of the full value of the trip, irrespective of the interests responsible for the failure. In other words, the practice has been to treat all of the lines between terminal as one interest in dealing with extraordinary allowances, and the fact of there being a failure to arrive on time at the objective point, has resulted in a deduction for the full value over the entire line of the special allowance.

My letter of the 24th instant was a departure, experimentally, from past practice, justified only by the fact that both Atlanta and Montgomery were important deflecting points; and the Department meant to deal very broadly with the situation, at least for a time, or until it is found advisable to restore the old practice.

Unless, however, the Washington connection is made, the through service is valueless in the event of failure to enforce the other connections; and the Department will not make the extraordinary payments in such instances as there is an absolute failure over the entire route.

Yours, respectfully,

J. LOWRIE BELL,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Col. A. B. ANDREWS,
Vice-President Richmond and Danville Railroad Company, and Agent of the Receivers, Raleigh, N. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., November 17, 1893.

SIR: It being our understanding that trains 35 and 37 are to wait indefinitely at Washington for their direct connection from the north, the order of October 24, 1893, will be so far modified as shall admit of the giving weight to the shortening of your time whenever you wait at Washington more than forty-five minutes for the northern connections, rather than leave on time, and thereby occasion a day's delay to the mails from the north.

Yours, respectfully,

J. LOWRIE BELL,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Col. A. B. ANDREWS,
Vice-President Richmond and Danville Railroad, and Agent for the Receivers, Raleigh, N. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., November 20, 1893.

SIR: Answering yours of the 18th instant:

If, because of late arrivals from the north, you have to wait more than forty-five minutes at Washington, and because of such delay you are unable to accomplish your connections south of Washington, you will not be subjected to deductions from your special pay, provided, of course, that upon your own lines not any more time is occupied than is called for in your own schedule.

Yours, respectfully,

J. LOWRIE BELL,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Col. A. B. ANDREWS,
Vice-President Richmond and Danville Railroad Company, And Agent for the Receivers, Raleigh, N. C.

Mr. GEAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GEAR. Is it not also true that these contracts provide a penalty for failure to make connections?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes; not only may the contracts be revoked, but there is a penalty for failure to make connections, and the penalty is made in this way: They divide the amount that is paid to the railroad company by the number of days in the year; and if there are two trains a day, then they average the amount for every train; and if one train misses connection the Postmaster-General deducts from the amount that the railroad is entitled to for that trip the pro rata amount that it would have received if it had carried the mail.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand—the remark was made that this was a subsidy—is it not a fact that the Atlantic Coast Line at one time had this contract, and it was so unprofitable that it gave it up, and that there is no provision in this bill for any special railroad having the contract?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The mail goes over certain lines.

Mr. SWANSON. The Southern mail.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It is a fact, so far as I know and believe, that the Coast Line companies voluntarily relinquished the appropriation. As long as they were willing to carry the mail and as long as they enforced the schedules made by the Postmaster-General, there was no opposition in the House here—except the general opposition to anything of this sort—to the Coast Line companies continuing to receive the contract.

Mr. SWANSON. And it was not profitable enough for them to continue it.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I do not know why they gave it up, but I understood they gave it up because they said that the Department exacted too much from them and hampered them in many ways.

Mr. SWANSON. And as I understand, under this provision the Post-Office Department prepares the schedules for these trains to run by.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The Post-Office Department makes the schedules.

Mr. SWANSON. And the schedules are made so as to make connections for the mail, and not for passengers.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The Post-Office authorities make the schedules, and if the railroad companies miss connections, then there is a penalty imposed for each failure. The schedules are the ones most preferred by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. GEAR. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. Is it not a fact that all the coast-line towns receive their mails by this fast mail?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Very many of them do.

Mr. GEAR. And all the South, at the coast points, get their mail by this fast line?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. All the through mails that were formerly carried over the coast-line roads are now carried by the other companies under this appropriation. They carry the mails right through to Florida and carry the mails right through to New Orleans, there being double fast mails to Florida where there was but one fast mail train before, and a double fast mail train to New Orleans where there was but one before.

I wish to say another thing. This mail that was formerly carried over the Coast Line is paid by weight, and the Coast Line Company receives to-day the same pay for such weight that it received a year ago, for the weighing only takes place every four years, and with the other companies the weighing took place two years ago; and all this Florida mail that is diverted from the coast-line companies from New York to Tampa, and is carried over the new line and its connections, is transported without any compensation, and no compensation on account of the increased volume of mail matter will be paid the present contracting lines until the next weighing, some two years hence.

Mr. GEAR. Is it not a fact that places like Charleston and Savannah are supplied by this new coast-line route.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Charleston, Savannah, and Florida points are all supplied by it.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman now yield to me for a question?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is it not a fact that if this appropriation is cut out it will largely reduce the fast mail facilities to the South?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. If the appropriation is eliminated I do not believe that the Southern cities, as a whole, will have fast mails any longer, and for this reason: The Coast Line Company, which formerly received this appropriation, have a splendid line of road, and the trains over this route could make as fast time as they do on the Richmond and Danville and the other roads that now carry the fast mail; but the coast-line roads run their trains now for their own convenience, for the purpose of getting passengers, and not for expediting the mails. They start from New York at 9:30 in the morning—too late for the newspaper mail—so that when they get down to Jacksonville, Fla., at 1:35 in the afternoon, the Richmond and Danville train has been there four hours and fifteen minutes earlier with all the Northern mails.

Mr. LOUD. Before the gentleman gets through speaking of these contracts, I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any different or special or specific contract with this Richmond and Danville road from that which exists with all the other roads carrying the mail?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Undoubtedly there is.

Mr. LOUD. The Post-Office Department informed me that there was no contract. I do not care about it particularly; but there is a different statement. I have been informed that there is no contract, but simply an agreement.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. An agreement is a contract. What is the difference between an agreement and a contract?

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman has laid some stress upon the passengers carried by these trains. I will ask the gentleman if any railroad carrying mail does not have to pay penalties if their trains are late? Does not the same rule of law apply to all other railroad lines as applies to that to which you have referred?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I do not think so.

Mr. LOUD. You do not think so! You ought to know that it does.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The Postmaster-General has the power to make this schedule?

Mr. LOUD. You will find that every railroad carrying the mails is subject to pay a penalty if their trains do not arrive on schedule time, without they can show good and sufficient reason.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will ask the gentleman what the penalty on the other roads is? I have stated what the penalty is on this road.

Mr. LOUD. The penalty is stated in the present law; I can not tell exactly what it is. The gentleman does not mean to say that the penalty applied to this road differs from that applied to any other road.

Mr. GEAR. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. The difference between these fast mail trains and ordinary trains carrying the mail is this, is it not: In the ordinary train the company makes its own time and its own schedules, and in these fast trains the schedule is made by the Department.

Mr. LOUD. The Department makes the schedules of the trains on every trunk road of the United States, and that the gentleman will find if he only investigates.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I want to state to the gentleman from California that I think that is a point on which he is mistaken.

Mr. LOUD. I am not mistaken.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Then I want to ask the gentleman from California why it is that this road, the Coast Line Company, that formerly carried the mails from New York to Tampa and other points, is now four hours and fifteen minutes later at Jacksonville and Tampa than the other trains which carry the mails through? Is it not because they are not compelled to run by schedules made by the Post-Office Department?

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman asks me that question, I would deny the assertion that they are four hours later at Tampa. This road is carrying the mails under an agreement and the schedule of time is made by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. But the Coast Line Company was running on schedules made by the Department a year ago, and the same company is carrying the mails by a different schedule now. The Government is not making those schedules. That company now makes its own schedules.

Mr. LOUD. There is an agreement.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. What is the agreement? Here is the idea. Under the arrangement with the Coast Line the Government had a special schedule and compelled the railroad to expedite the mails, according to schedules made by the Department. The Coast Line relinquished the appropriation and the Government no longer requires that line to expedite the mails.

I want to call attention to this fact. When the Coast Line companies were required to carry the fast mail they made a special contract with the Post-Office authorities, and the Post-Office authorities required them to expedite the mails by certain schedules which the Department insisted upon. When the Coast Lines relinquished the appropriation, then the Department let them make their own schedules. It no longer made any contract or agreement with them. It permitted them to make their own schedules in their own way, whether they expedited the mails or not, and as a matter of fact the schedules they have made have not expedited the through mails.

Mr. MALLORY. At present has not the Coast Line a right to change its schedules whenever it chooses for its own purposes without any penalty?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Certainly. I am glad the gentleman called attention to that. The difference between the lines operating under this appropriation and every other line that is required to carry the mails is this, every other railroad company can make its schedules to suit itself and change them whenever it pleases, whereas the companies that carry the mails in pursuance of this appropriation are compelled to carry them in such a manner as they may be directed to do by the Department and by such schedules as the Department may adopt.

Does not everybody know that the Richmond and Danville Railroad would a great deal rather get this appropriation and have only one train from here to New Orleans, or from New York to New Orleans if the Post-Office Department would permit it? The Department not only insists on two through fast mails from New York via Washington and Atlanta to New Orleans, but also on two fast mails by Washington and Columbia, S. C., on down to Florida points. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] stated here in his opening remarks that no Postmaster-General had ever favored this appropriation—that it had been in the bill for seventeen years, but that no Postmaster-General had ever favored it. What is the fact? The first appropriation, $150,000, was made in 1878. In 1879 it was $125,000; in 1880 it was $150,000; in 1881 there was an appropriation of $350,000; in 1882 there was an appropriation of $425,000, and in 1883 the appropriation was $600,000. Does anybody suppose that those appropriations would have gone on increasing from $150,000 up to $600,000 unless the Post-Office authorities favored them? But that is not all. This appropriation started under Postmaster-General Key, and in his report for 1879, page 11, will be found these remarks:

> The appropriation of $150,000 to enable the Postmaster-General to obtain proper facilities for the prompt transmission of the mails by the railroad companies has enabled the Department to prevent injury to the service upon the most important lines and has in several instances enabled the Department to secure the running of special trains of great value to the business interests of the country. I would therefore recommend that this appropriation be renewed for the next fiscal year, and that the amount be increased according to the estimate submitted by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General at that time was Mr. Thomas J. Brady, of Indiana.

Mr. KYLE. Will the gentleman tell us where that fund was used at that time?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I take for granted that a part of it was used over this very same line we are providing for now.

Mr. LOUD. What year was that?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Eighteen hundred and seventy-nine.

Mr. LOUD. Fifteen thousand dollars was used there at that time.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Here is what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General said upon that subject:

By the use of this fund the Department has succeeded in preventing any injury to the postal service on the most important lines, and in several cases has secured special trains of great value to the business interests of the sections interested.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the idea of these gentlemen seems to be that this appropriation is bound to do harm, and has done harm all the time from the beginning; but I say it has done good all the time. I will show before I get through that only one Postmaster-General ever directly and emphatically opposed this item in the Post-Office appropriation bill; and even Mr. Wanamaker himself, under the very same authority now proposed to be conferred on Postmaster-General Bissell, used the fund because he believed that its use promoted the good of the service.

Mr. COX. As I understand the gentleman, under these contracts with the Postmaster-General the roads carry the mails at a certain speed and deliver them?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. And there is faster delivery and better mail service on these roads than upon the roads on which the mail is carried in the ordinary passenger trains; so that the whole point of the question is as to paying this compensation for fast mail service, as compared with that rendered by carrying the mails on the ordinary passenger trains?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. That is all there is in it.

Mr. COX. Well, that is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is what was said by Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, in his report as Postmaster-General for 1880. I read from page 13:

It would be impossible to maintain the service at its present state of efficiency without this appropriation.

Then he adds:

It is the desire of the Department to extend this service to business communities where it is needed and would be most valuable.

In 1880 the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service stated:

The special fund placed at the disposal of the Postmaster-General for the present fiscal year is $350,000, which has proved of incalculable benefit to the service and enabled him to continue and extend the benefits of fast mail service. I would, therefore, respectfully recommend that there be appropriated $350,000, and such further additional sum as will enable him to establish, maintain, and continue the fast mail service.

When Mr. Thomas L. James, of New York, was Postmaster-General, he said:

Appropriations have been made each year since 1878 to enable the Department to secure from railroad companies facilities for the transportation of the mails for which compensation could not be made under the general law. The advantages secured to the public by this expenditure are very great.

And he adds:

The appropriation for this object for the current year is $425,000; and I recommend that $500,000 be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883.

As a matter of fact $600,000 was appropriated for that year.

I have here a great many other extracts. Here is the language of Hon. Thomas O. Howe, of Wisconsin, in his report as Postmaster-General for 1882. He favors this special appropriation. So did Mr. Gresham when Postmaster-General.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask a couple of questions pertinent to the matter now under consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. At the time the recommendations which the gentleman has just read were made, what was the weight pay of the railroads receiving the subsidy?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The same as it is now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Ah; but how much did it amount to per mile?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Of course I have not the data which the gentleman wishes in regard to all these railroads. I will state to the gentleman that, as a matter of fact, the weight of the mail in many instances has increased with the business and prosperity of the country in different parts of the United States, while in some parts there has been no increase. On some of the railroads in the South, especially, there has been very little increase.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it not a fact that on the very roads now receiving this subsidy the pay by weight amounts in some instances to upwards of $400 per mile; away above the average mail pay on trunk lines throughout the country.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina: I am not able to tell the gentleman how much the average is per mile. I will say it varies on the different railroads, but I will say to the gentleman it can not possibly be that the railroads from Washington to New Orleans and Florida carrying the mails now under discussion are receiving extraordinary rates from the Government There are some railroads in this country that carry 20,000 passengers per mile per year; there are others that carry only 200 passengers per mile per year. Some railroads receive as much as $1,500 per mile per annum and others as little as $50 per mile per annum.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman from North Carolina will allow me, I will state some figures in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Very well.

Mr. LOUD. In relation to this system of roads I will state that the increase in the weight of the mails in three years has been 74 per cent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I will ask the gentleman this question: While formerly, when the mail matter carried was so much less than now, it may have been necessary to give these roads this subsidy, is not the necessity removed by the vast increase of their weight pay?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I want to be perfectly frank and candid with the gentleman about this matter. As I stated some time ago, the amount we now appropriate is only $196,622.14. Three years ago the amount was about $292,000. The first report made to this House by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads at the first session of the Fifty-second Congress, when I was chairman of that committee, reduced the amount from $292,000 to $196,000, as in this bill.

Mr. LOUD. Because that was all there was expended the preceding year.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Exactly, and why was it not all expended? Because the authorities of the Post-Office Department, and the Postmaster-General were not spending all the money and have not been spending all the money that has been appropriated for this service. They have been very careful and scrupulous about it, and it is accordingly being reduced year after year; and I will state here and now that the present Postmaster-General, who is a most excellent business man and a very able lawyer, has failed, up to this time, to use some $25,000 of the appropriation made for the current year, and if at the end of the current year this question comes up again, and the Postmaster-General shall not have used $25,000 of the $196,000 appropriated, the effect will be that the next time a report comes to the House on this subject from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the appropriation will be reduced by that amount or whatever amount the Postmaster-General may fail to expend.

And that of itself shows conclusively to the people and to Congress and the country that the Postmaster-General is very careful about how he expends the fund. He does not spend it just because it is given to him for that purpose, but if he can make suitable contracts with the railroad companies for proper expedition of the mails he does so. If he can not make satisfactory contracts with them, then he refuses to expend the money. So that, in my opinion, $25,000 of this appropriation for the current year will be unexpended at the end of the year.

Now, I call attention to what Mr. Gresham said when he was Postmaster-General, upon this subject. See his report for 1883, page 15:

The large expansion of the system in late years and its general use for postal purposes render the question of just and reasonable rates for the service of vital importance.

I refrain from discussing the question at present, as my views will be given in a separate report, when the committee now considering it shall have submitted their conclusions.

I can not find the special report referred to by Mr. Gresham, but I understand he went before the Post-Office Committee at that time, and in consequence of what he said to the committee the appropriation made for 1884 was $600,000.

Mr. LOUD. In 1884?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I am mistaken. Six hundred thousand dollars was the appropriation for 1883.

Now, here is what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General said in the report for 1883—Mr. R. A. Elmer, of New York:

SPECIAL FACILITIES.

The cost of "special facilities" on railroad routes for the year ending June 30, 1883, was $185,000, and a like amount is appropriated for the current year. The results secured by this expenditure are very highly appreciated by the communities interested, and I therefore recommend that a like sum be appropriated for 1885.

In 1884 Postmaster-General Hatton recommended this appropriation, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General at that time, Mr. Henry D. Lyman, of New York, recommended it strongly.

In 1885 Postmaster-General Vilas recommended it, and his Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. A. Leo Knott, of Maryland, recommended it earnestly. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General said:

I earnestly approve there commendation of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service for the maintenance of railway facilities, and for the reason so fully set forth by me.

In 1886 Mr. Dickinson gave a qualified recommendation, but his Second Assistant strongly recommended it. Mr. Dickinson has been quoted here as being opposed to the appropriation. I will show you exactly what Mr. Dickinson said, so that his views may be placed exactly before the Committee on that subject.

I quote from page 25 of his report for 1888:

Appropriation for special facilities.—I desire to call attention to the settled application of the appropriation made for extra facilities and to the absence of any means to improvements of the service in portions of the country and on lines equally if not more deserving than those for which special appropriations are made. These special appropriations are not sufficient for proper distribution and create an indisposition on the part of railroad companies to coöperate for the best attainable service. Dissatisfaction is natural enough when the Government pays one road more than others, and for no better or more necessary service than is expected or required from many others.

I do not venture an opinion as to whether or not the rate of compensation allowed by law is sufficiently liberal to secure for the Government adequate and the best service. It is certain that the dissatisfaction caused by extra compensation to some and not to others has prevented in some instances cordial coöperation with the Department to secure much needed improvement.

So that Mr. Dickinson's objection was not to the fact that the appropriation was made, but that it ought to be made general. He did not deny that the appropriation of itself was a very useful appropriation.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. And he made that remark, too, after a recommendation for an appropriation had been made and indorsed by his Superintendent of the General Railway Mail Service and by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. That is true. I will say, further, that in 1889 the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Bell, then, I believe, General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, recommended an appropriation for special facilities. He raised a question against it in 1890. He opposed the appropriation in 1891 and again in 1892, but in the last report made by him as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in 1893, after longer experience and more knowledge of postal affairs, he expressed no opposition to the special facility appropriation.

Mr. KYLE. Who was that?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Bell.

Mr. KYLE. You are not arguing that he is in favor of it now, are you?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. If the gentleman had listened to what I stated, he would have understood my argument. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General opposed it twice, but he failed to oppose it in his last report. He said nothing about it, and I must take it for granted that he thinks it is useful.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. He is not opposing it.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. He has not opposed it in any communication to this House this year, that I know of.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact, that as far back as 1881, before we had any special fast mail facilities in the South, the one man in Congress instrumental in inducing Congress to give a special mail facility appropriation was Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia. I want to read his letter. This is a short letter which I will read, and I will publish another as part of my remarks. This letter is addressed to the Postmaster-General, Hon. Thomas L. James, and is dated National Hotel, Washington, December 15, 1881.

SOUTHERN MAIL FACILITIES.

LETTER OF HON. A. H. STEVENS TO THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

NATIONAL HOTEL, Washington D. C., December 15, 1881.

DEAR SIR; I inclose you a communication received by me several days ago from several of the most prominent business citizens of Augusta, including the mayor, upon the subject of mail facilities in that city, and especially the arrival there of the New York mail. I also inclose an editorial which I clipped from the leading paper of Augusta to-day; it was the issue of the 13th instant of that paper.

This is a subject upon which the people of that city and section of country have a deep interest; we feel it as high up as I live on the Georgia Railroad (64 miles), and even higher. If any additional appropriation is necessary to enable the New York mail to be put in Augusta by 7 o'clock in the morning, I should like to know it and the amount, or whatever the impediment is or obstacle, I should like to be informed of it, that I may have it removed if possible.

Our mail arrangements now for Augusta and up the Georgia Railroad are in a worse condition for the convenience of the people than they have been for twenty years.

Yours, most respectfully,

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS,
Member Congress of Georgia.

Hon. THOMAS L. JAMES, Postmaster-General.

The other letter referred to is as follows:

LETTER OF HON. A. H. STEPHENS TO THE EDITORS OF THE AUGUSTA (GA.) CHRONICLE AND CONSTITUTIONALIST.

NATIONAL HOTEL, Washington, D. C., January 6, 1882.

Editors Chronicle and Constitutionalist:

DEAR SIRS: Inclosed I send you a letter received by me yesterday from Hon. Thomas L. James, Postmaster-General at the time of its date.

It was written December 31, though not received by me until yesterday, as stated. I send it to you for publication, as an answer to mine to him, under date December 15 last, in relation to the mail facilities of Augusta.

The letter of Mr. James very fully explains itself. Your city as well as country readers will doubtless be interested in its perusal. I have given earnest and constant attention to this subject since the opening of the present session of Congress. After personal conference with the Post-Office officials who have charge of railroad mail service, I deem it due to them to say that the fault of the irregularities in our mails in Augusta and on the Georgia Railroad is not attributable to them in any way, nor is it attributable to anyone connected with the Post-Office Department.

The trouble is with the railroad syndicates. Mr. Terrell, of Atlanta, superintendent United States mail service in our and adjoining States, I am satisfied, is an able, diligent, and efficient officer, looking quite as earnestly after the interests of Augusta as of Atlanta, Charleston, or Savannah. The failures of the mails at Augusta, Atlanta, and elsewhere are owing to the railroads not coming up to time. Upon an examination of a transcript from the records it is proper for me to state here that I find the failures of the fast mails at Atlanta have been much more frequent than at Augusta.

Upon my urging the Department to have a fast mail train leave Charlotte upon the arrival there of the fast mail train to Atlanta, the reply was that such train from Charlotte to Augusta would have to remain at Charlotte until the arrival of the fast train from the East, and this very often was from one to two and three hours behind time, so that no increased facility of mail service could thereby be secured to Augusta. There is now a fast mail on the Coast Line, as I believe it is called; that is, from this place to Charleston, Savannah, and Florida, via Richmond, Va., Wilmington, N. C., and Florence, S. C. The mail on this route, owing to the nature of the soil and the condition of the roads, seldom fails.

I proposed to the Department to put a fast train from Florence, S. C., to Augusta, in connection with the fast mail on the Coast Line. If this were done, Augusta would receive the New York mails in the morning at 7:30, or two hours sooner than she now does. This, I understood from the officials, could and would be done if the necessary appropriation should be granted. Be assured I shall do all in my power to secure the appropriation. Should this be done, Augusta and all the towns on the Georgia Railroad will have all the facilities, it seems to me, that are at present attainable. The train on the Georgia Railroad can leave at 7:30 or 8 at farthest every morning, taking the Northern as well as the Augusta City papers and letters for distribution before noon half-way up to Atlanta, and can actually deliver the New York mail in Atlanta daily sooner than is now practically done by the Air-Line road. I earnestly trust this result may be accomplished.

Yours, truly,

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.

In consequence greatly of the influence of Mr. Stephens of Georgia, Postmaster-General James entered heartily into the movement, and from that time down to the present we have had these fast mail facilities.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to prolong the discussion. I will call attention, however, to the fact that train 35, as it is called, which leaves New York at 4:30 in the morning, expedites the mails over what they were expedited one year ago to the following extent:

MEMORANDA.

Prior to July, 1893, there was but one continuous mail schedule between New York and New Orleans:

Leaving New York 4:30 p. m.; passing Atlanta 4:10 p. m.; arriving at New Orleans 7:35 a. m.

There are now two through schedules over that route as follows:

Leaving New York at 4:30 p. m. and 4:30 a. m.; arriving at Atlanta 3:55 p. m. and 5:20 a. m.; arriving at Montgomery 9:20 p. m. and 11:05 a. m.; arriving at New Orleans 7:35 a. m. and 10:25 p. m.

The 4:30 p. m. train is unchanged.

The 4:30 a. m. train has been made continuous.

The Department now avails itself of both of the existing Richmond and Danville schedules to advance mails for the State of Florida, via Charlotte and Columbia, the following being the Florida schedule via Charlotte:

Leave New York at 4:20 p. m.; arrive at Jacksonville 9:00 p. m.

Leave New York at 4:30 a. m.; arrive at Jacksonville 9:20 a. m.

While I am upon this subject I will state to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] that the train he referred to, which he says is ten minutes slower in its run from New York to New Orleans, makes the same schedule identically, minute for minute, that it made a year ago. In addition to that we have the fast train besides, No. 35, which makes continuous through schedules and connections to New Orleans from New York, via Washington and Atlanta.

Mr. KYLE. I know the gentleman does not intend to do me an injustice. I will ask him if he got the information from the Post-Office Department, and if that information further does not show that there is a difference of ten minutes, according to the statement of the Postmaster-General?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will state to the gentleman that I have not personally examined the schedules at the Post-Office Department. It may be they may show that; but if they do show it, I will state to the gentleman that it is a mistake.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. It is a mistake.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. And it is utterly immaterial anyway, because the schedules are made by the Post-Office authorities themselves, and if they think it ought to be ten minutes less than it was a year ago, that is their affair. The railroads do not make the schedules. The railroads are willing to carry the mails even faster than they are now carried, if the Postmaster-General should insist upon it.

Mr. KYLE. The time is ten minutes slower than it was before they got this additional payment.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. KYLE. I get the schedule from the Post-Office Department.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. The Post-Office Department is mistaken.

Mr. KYLE. The Post-Office Department may be mistaken, but I am relying upon them.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I want to state to the gentleman, with the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina, that I went over this road about two weeks ago, and on this train, and that I arrived in New Orleans, at the Morgan depot at 7:25 in the morning and Canal street at 7:35; and I know that the train was on time. I was on it, and I went all the way from Washington. I know we got there exactly at that hour, as was verified by several watches on the train.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Is not the hour for the departure of that train fixed by the Department instead of by the railroad?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It is fixed by the Department; and if any of these fast trains do not run fast enough the Department is to blame, for they fix the schedules they most prefer.

Mr. KYLE. Then if they do not expedite the mail, it is of no service.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The gentleman does not seem to understand that there has been another train put on from New York. One in addition to the train of a year ago. Does not the gentleman from Mississippi call that expediting the mails when it arrives thirteen hours and ten minutes earlier in New Orleans and fifteen hours and six minutes earlier at Birmingham than was possible a year ago? Because in one case the schedule is just the same as it was a year ago, is that any reason why, putting this other train on, the mail has not been expedited? The gentleman does not seem to understand that that there are now two fast trains a day instead of one.

Mr. KYLE. Oh, yes.

Mr. LOUD. At what time does it arrive at New Orleans?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. At 10:25 p. m.

Mr. KYLE. I deny it.

Mr. LOUD. Is that a good time for distributing the mail?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The time is fixed by the Post-Office Department for the purpose of facilitating the mails.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It does not go to all other places in the night. It has to go to some place in the night, I would say to my friend. Now, the schedule time is expedited to Macon six hours and five minutes; to Columbia, eight hours and thirty minutes, and to Savannah eleven hours and twenty minutes. I will not detain the committee longer, Mr. Chairman, but will publish the following for information:

Special facilities on trunk lines.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February, 8, 1894.

SIR: The existing orders provide for the following per annum payments on account of the special-facility appropriation for the present fiscal year:

No. of route.	Termini.	Railroad company.	Pay per annum.
109004	New York to Philadelphia	Pennsylvania	$11,331.25
113001	Philadelphia to Washington.	Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore.	17,191.25
114002 114016 114033 121001	Washington to Atlanta	Richmond and Danville	81,286.25
121003	Atlanta to West Point	Atlanta and West Point	10,790.00
124001	West Point to Montgomery	Western of Alabama	10,900.00
124012	Montgomery to New Orleans.	Louisville and Nashville.	39,840.00
	Total		171,238.75

No orders have been made as yet for the payment of any part of the appropriation to the railroads between Springfield, Mass., and New York, N. Y., because no schedules have been agreed upon that would warrant any extraordinary allowance. It is, however, not unlikely that the schedules will, at an early date, be so modified as shall cause the payment of a part, at least, of this year's appropriation to the railroads east of New York, N. Y.

Yours, respectfully,

J. LOWRIE BELL,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN S. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1894.

SIR: In reply to your note of the 30th instant, requesting information respecting the expenditure of the special facility item of the current year's appropriation "for necessary and special facilities," I would say:

The per annum rate thus far expended is $171,238.75, all of which has been awarded to the railroad mail carriers between New York, N. Y., and New Orleans, La., via Washington and Atlanta.

Our negotiations for the head of the specially designated route, Springfield, Mass., to New York, N. Y., have not, as yet, resulted in the establishment of a schedule warranting the payment of any portion of the special facility sum in that direction, because of which we have as yet made no orders of allowance. It is worth while to add, however, that the negotiations are still in progress with the eastern railroads for an expedited schedule that will admit of the expenditure of the difference between $171,238.75 and $196,614.22, equals $25,375.47.

Yours, respectfully,

J. LOWRIE BELL,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN S. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1894.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 22d instant, asking to be advised respecting the mail service between New York and Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, I would say:

There exists at this time two continuous fast mail train schedules, via Washington, over the Piedmont system, which two schedules are those selected by the Department as the ones to be desired for the accomplishment of the most satisfactory through-mail service between New York and New Orleans via Atlanta.

In connection with the through service with New Orleans it has been arranged, commencing with February 1, ultimo, to utilize the same schedules for the advancement of a considerable extent of the Florida mails that will be deflected from the Piedmont line at Charlotte, N. C., and reach Jacksonville, Fla., over the route recently opened south from Savannah, Ga.

To your inquiry concerning the character and extent of the existing through-mail service as compared with that of the past, I would say that the present schedules are improvements over those which have heretofore been enforced.

Yours, respectfully,

J. LOWRIE BELL,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Col. A. B. ANDREWS,
Vice-President and General Agent of the Receivers,
Richmond and Danville Railroad Company,
No. 1200 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 16, 1894.

SIR: I beg leave to respectfully invite your attention to the benefits resulting to the public through the establishment of the great fast mail service between New York and Atlanta and New Orleans, with special reference to the portion from Washington south, and the situation under which the service is rendered.

On January 1, 1893, the Richmond and Danville system maintained a train service that met the requirements of its general business and afforded a good mail service as an item of such general business. The train service was as follows:

No. 9 left Washington at 8:30 a. m., arrived at Atlanta in twenty-three and one-half hours, at 8 a. m. next day, and had no connection whatever south of Montgomery. Train No. 11 left Washington at 11 p. m., and was run at a very slow rate of speed without postal car to Lynchburg, and with postal car from Lynchburg to Atlanta, arriving at Atlanta at 10 p. m. Train No. 37, the South Western Vestibuled Limited, left New York at 4:30 p. m., Washington at 10:43 p. m., and arrived at Atlanta at 3:55 p. m., Montgomery at 9:30 p. m., and at New Orleans 7:25 a. m. This, in brief, was the situation in the early months of 1893.

Congress desiring to meet the postal needs of the greatest States of the South and dependent regions, made appropriation effective from July 1, 1893, for a special mail service from New York and Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, and the great country and large population of the State of Texas beyond. The advantages to be reaped from the closer mail connection between the greatest commercial metropols of the East and the principal centers of business and population of the South are so obvious to all that comment thereon would be out of place.

The Richmond and Danville system and its connections appreciating the purpose of Congress and desiring to contribute as much as possible to the great contemplated postal improvements heartily coöperated by establishing a special fast mail between New York and New Orleans, beginning May 14, 1893. This fast mail train No. 35, leaves New York at 4:35 a. m., Washington at 11:01 a. m., and arrives at Atlanta at 5:20 a. m., and this train receives at New York a Boston connection that leaves that city at 7:30 p. m., after the arrival of all rail post-office lines from all parts of New England and leaves New York with a very large mail for the Southern States. It gathers in the mail from Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington and delivers it throughout the South, far in advance of all former schedules.

The Richmond and Danville system has arranged the schedules of its auxiliary lines and put an extra train between Charlotte and Columbia, by which mail is delivered at Columbia at 1:35 a. m., Savannah at 4:30 a. m., Jacksonville at 9:30 a. m., being twenty-nine hours from New York, which is the shortest time ever made between these points. The arrival in Jacksonville is in time for distribution to the whole State of Florida. Connection is also made for Charleston, arriving there at 9:30 a. m.

To be more explicit and point out especially the advantages of the service now performed, in comparison with last year, I will give you the number of hours the mail has been facilitated. The New York letter and paper mail, the Boston and New England mail, the Central and Western New York and Pennsylvania mail, which left New York at 4:30 a. m., in 1893, reached Washington after the train for Atlanta, Montgomery, and New Orleans had left, and it was delayed until 10:43 p. m. before leaving Washington.

Under the present fast mail service the New York mail, together with the mail from all parts of New England of the previous day, is put in Danville at 5:50 p. m. of the same day, Greensboro at 7:30 p. m., Charlotte at 10:20 p. m., Atlanta 5:20 a. m. the following morning; Montgomery 11:05 a. m., Birmingham at 12:59 p. m., New Orleans at 10:25 p. m.; to points on the Central Railroad of Georgia, which includes Macon, Albany, Columbus, Tifton, etc., by and before 2 p. m., and points in Georgia between Atlanta and Chattanooga, Tenn., before 1 p. m. Thus, by this increased facility between New York, and Washington and Danville, Greensboro, Salisbury, Charlotte, and Atlanta, the mails are expedited twelve hours, Montgomery fourteen hours, New Orleans thirteen hours, Birmingham fifteen hours.

It will not be amiss, I think, to draw a comparison between the time made to Florida points in 1893 and now. The mail which left New York at 4:30 a. m. was put in Jacksonville at 11 a. m. in 1893, and in Tampa at 8:55 p. m.; it now reaches Jacksonville at 9:20 a. m., Tampa at 5:30 p. m., in ample time to make connection with the Cuban steamships. It will be seen, therefore, that in addition to expediting the mails between New York and the inland and the far South and Southwest, the Richmond and Danville has decreased the time consumed to all Florida points from one to three hours.

It is obvious that this special fast mail train No. 35 ramifies and expedites mails from twelve to twenty-four hours to a vast area of country bounded on the east by the Atlantic and reaching far out into the great developed regions of the Southern States, in which is included the principal centers of business and population of the South. Thus, a service of the most extraordinary value is being rendered the great Southern country by a connection from Atlanta which is direct and very fast to Montgomery, Mobile, and New Orleans, where connections are made for transmississippi.

The service north-bound is very fast, and has proven entirely satisfactory to the postal authorities; and it will doubtless be clear to you and all others who may consider the subject that it would be impracticable in favorable conditions for a railroad company to maintain such exceptional service without substantial recognition on the part of the Government, and this is manifested in the strongest possible manner by the present prostration of all business, which renders the reduction of train service everywhere a necessity.

Very respectfully,

A. B. ANDREWS,
Vice-President, and General Agent of the Receivers.

Hon. JOHN S. HENDERSON,
Chairman of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to recognize some gentleman in favor of the amendment. If there is any gentleman who desires to speak in favor of the amendment the Chair will recognize him, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia afterwards.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman on this amendment. If there is any other gentleman——

Mr. LOUD. I beg to differ with the Chairman on that question. The Chair has not recognized me on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs the pardon of the gentleman.

Mr. LOUD. I spoke in the general debate on the bill, but not on this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will, then, recognize the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I desired only to make a suggestion to expedite debate. There is only one to be heard on this side, and I suggest that they go ahead on the other side.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi makes this mistake. There was one fast train on this line prior to this appropriation that made the time in thirty-nine hours and five minutes. The second mail train makes the time in fifty-five hours and twenty-five minutes.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Between what points?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Between New York and New Orleans. Now, when this appropriation was made and given to this line of railroad the Postmaster-General required another train put on its line, and this extra fast train that was put on at the demand of the Post-Office Department, makes the time from New York to New Orleans in thirteen hours and ten minutes less than the train of which it took the place. These are the facts. The gentleman has only to look at the schedule and discover the facts. Now, Mr. Chairman, our people are interested in this matter, and I send this communication to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. LON. LIVINGSTON and other Members Georgia Delegation,
United States Congress, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting representing the Chamber of Commerce, the Commercial Club, and citizens generally, held in the hall of the Chamber of Commerce to-day, Mr. Stewart Woodson, president of the chamber, was called to the chair. On motion, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas the citizens of Atlanta and of this portion of Georgia are vitally interested in the continuance of the fast-mail service now in operation between Boston and New York and New Orleans via Atlanta; and

Whereas this service is dependent upon a continuation of the appropriation which expires in June next;

And whereas this question is now pending before the present Congress, to be acted on at an early date: Therefore

Be it resolved, By this joint meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, the Commercial Club, and business men of Atlanta, that the Senators and Representatives from Georgia be, and they hereby are, earnestly requested to give their support to the continuance of the fast mail.

Resolved further, That the Chamber of Commerce be requested to appoint a committee to visit Washington in the interest of the fast-mail service should it become necessary.

H. G. SAUNDERS, Secretary.

APRIL 2, 1894.

From every section of our Southland this demand comes up, from individuals, from conventions of business men, and from boards of trade. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] says that this appropriation is of no use, that this railroad is doing no extra work for this appropriation. This committee will have to do only one thing to discover the gentleman's mistake. These fast trains are put on by the Department and controlled by the Department. Their schedules are made by the Department; they are positively forbidden to do any local business on the line between New York and New Orleans that would interfere with schedule as fixed by the Department. They do not stop long enough at towns of three, four, or five thousand inhabitants for a passenger to get on; the Department does not permit it. They are precluded from doing anything to develop their passenger traffic. And yet the gentleman from Mississippi says that these trains are giving no better mail facilities to our people than they gave without this appropriation!

If the gentleman had traveled on the lines in question he would never have made such a speech on this floor. I do not know where or how he got his information, but I am sure that when he sees the mistake he has made he will be willing to correct it. Mr. Chairman, this line for which this appropriation is made is a feeder to every prominent Southern city down to Tampa, Fla., and over to Galveston and New Orleans. But if the appropriation should be withdrawn there is not a railroad man in the United States nor a man on this floor but can see at once that these fast trains must come off. If they are to be confined to schedule time, if they are to be confined to the mail business, as they are now confined, these fast trains must come off.

Then, you get your old slow mail trains from New York to New Orleans, taking fifty-five hours and twenty-five minutes, making a difference of thirteen hours and ten minutes. Talk about a subsidy to the railroad company! Why, Mr. Chairman, it is a known fact on this floor—although we have not the official records to establish it—that the Sea Coast Air Line gave up this appropriation rather than submit to the conditions imposed by the Department. In other words, they knew that they could make more money by seeking to develop the passenger traffic along their line than by submitting to the conditions and restrictions imposed by the Post-Office Department.

This is no subsidy for another reason. It is an effort on the part of one great arm of the Government, the Post-Office Department, to supply the people of this country with fast mail service. Benefiting whom? Benefiting the business men of the East, the business men of the Middle States, the business men of the Southern States. How can this be called a subsidy when these mail trains perform a specific duty under contract with the Government and receive this amount as a consideration for the work performed?

It is not for the benefit of the passenger traffic. It is not to shorten the time in which a man can travel between New York and New Orleans, or between Washington and New Orleans. Nobody can get on these special trains except at such large cities as Montgomery, Atlanta, and Charlotte, where the trains are compelled to stop to change engines and the other outfit that is necessary to run them. Only at these great points can a passenger get on at all. Subsidy! You might as well describe the free-delivery system in New York City or in Cincinnati as a subsidy. You might as well make the charge of subsidy against anything else that we do here to facilitate the mail service?

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman claims that this additional train is a fast mail train. Can he inform us what time this train makes to New Orleans, and also what time the slow train makes to New Orleans?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have just stated it; and I want to say to the gentleman from California and to the gentleman from Mississippi that I hold in my hand the schedule made by the Department.

Mr. LOUD. Well, what is the time of those two trains?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The slow train takes fifty-five hours and twenty-five minutes.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. That is the train that leaves at 8 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. LOUD. I am speaking of the present schedule.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand. This is the present schedule. Now, the fast train, which is controlled by the Post-Office Department, makes that same distance in forty-two hours and five minutes.

Mr. LOUD. What time does the other train make to New Orleans?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The original train that I alluded to, and to which my friend from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] made a mistake, takes thirty-nine hours and five minutes.

Mr. LOUD. So your "slow" train is faster than your "fast" train?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is not. There is the same mistake again. The gentleman ignores the fact that we had one fast train on the line before and one slow mail train, but when the appropriation was made and was applied by the Department to this line of service they required an extra fast train which made the time in forty-two hours and eight minutes.

Mr. LOUD. That train is simply extra between Atlanta and New Orleans.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir.

Mr. LOUD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That train formerly ran from New York to Atlanta, and there it stopped and made its connection with the regular vestibule train. Since the extra subsidy has been given that train has run through from Atlanta to New Orleans, and that is the only difference.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman is mistaken. I am just as familiar with the line from Atlanta to New Orleans as with the line from here to my home. The connections were not made at Atlanta, prior to the putting on of this fast mail train, by the slow mail train.

Mr. LOUD. That is just what I have said.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now the connection is made. Prior to this appropriation this train left New York, as the gentleman from North Carolina has said, too late for the Southern mail. At Washington City it made no connection with the New York mail. It made no connection with the mails at any points. Now it makes every connection from Springfield, Mass., to New Orleans on the one line, and Tampa, Fla., on the other.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to ask a question for information. What is this thirty-nine-hour train to which gentlemen have been referring?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is called the fast train.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. When was that in operation?

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. It is the vestibule limited.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It has heretofore been called the vestibule limited.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is it in operation now?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. It is a passenger train which leaves New York at an hour unsuitable for the mails.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does that train run now?

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It not only runs now, but it is made up for passengers, not for the mails.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does it not carry the mails?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, sir; but it does not carry through mail.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Still it makes the through trip in thirty-nine hours, which is three hours faster than what the gentleman calls the fast train.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me say this: Suppose that the mail leaving New York is sufficient in bulk and weight to load down six, eight, or ten mail cars to New Orleans; it would exclude every passenger car on the fast mail—not a single passenger could be hauled.

Mr. LOUD. That is not a supposable case.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In other words, I want gentlemen to understand that this is a special mail train dedicated to that purpose—exclusively, if necessary—without a single passenger on it, if necessary.

Mr. LOUD. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this thirty-nine-hour train is a regular mail train arriving in New Orleans at 7:25 in the morning, and making connection at 9:15 with the train running to Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California. The other train makes no western connection whatever.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, it is very singular to me that at this late day this appropriation should be objected to. As the gentleman from North Carolina has stated, for seventeen years the Appropriations Committee in this House in charge of this matter has reported an appropriation of this kind, and it has been indorsed by every Postmaster-General and every Assistant Postmaster-General except one, for seventeen years; and only objected to once by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Bell, and, although he objected in 1891 and 1892, he does not object to-day.

Mr. KYLE. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] intend to say to the House that every Postmaster-General save one during the last seventeen years has recommended this appropriation?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KYLE. Does not the gentleman know that Mr. Dickinson opposed it and Mr. Wanamaker opposed it——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Neither of them opposed it.

Mr. KYLE. And that the present Postmaster-General does not indorse it?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, it has not been twenty minutes since the chairman of the committee [Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina] read on this floor the declaration of Mr. Dickinson in favor of an appropriation of this sort; yet the gentleman from Mississippi rises now and asks me whether I do not know that Mr. Dickinson opposed this appropriation.

Mr. KYLE. I get my information from the report of the Postmaster-General himself.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The report has just been read, and it does not sustain the gentleman. The only point that Mr. Dickinson made on this appropriation was that it was exclusive and partial; that it was not broad enough to encourage a policy which he indorsed and approved, and he asked that the appropriation be made general, not specific. This is the correct inference from Mr. Dickinson's report.

As to the present Postmaster-General, the highest evidence that he approves this appropriation is this: When it is left to his discretion to decide whether he will use this money or not, he puts the appropriation in the estimates and then with the power left discretionary in his hands he uses the money for this purpose.

In answer to the gentleman from New York who propounded a question to the chairman of the committee, I say that the highest evidence that the present Postmaster-General approves this policy and this appropriation is that he has included in his estimates the amount necessary for this purpose. Besides, he has the power at any moment to discontinue this service, and he has not done so. Yet the gentleman from Mississippi stands up here and says the present Postmaster-General does not approve this appropriation. Whether that officer has ever opened his mouth on the subject or not makes no difference; take his acts. What has he done? He sends the money in the direction that the committee authorizes him to expend it and in conformity to the appropriation made, which is conclusive evidence that he approves of the scheme and expenditure. He has the power to spend it or not to spend it, as he may deem advisable. The matter is within his discretion.

Mr. KYLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. KYLE. I will state that I hold in my hand the paper which the gentleman from North Carolina read in his speech: I do not know whether it is the one he read from or not, but I find this statement:

Postmaster-General Don M. Dickinson opposed the appropriation. Page 25. See attached Senate Document No. 237.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I would ask the gentleman not to read my private memoranda to the House.

Mr. KYLE. I read exactly what Mr. Dickinson said.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Who made that memoranda?

Mr. KYLE. I find it in these papers, and I stated that I got it from the Postmaster-General's report, too.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, the gentleman from Mississippi is mistaken again. How can we trust him——

Mr. KYLE. The gentleman from Georgia does not mean to intimate that I am endeavoring to mislead the House in this matter?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly not. I said that you were mistaken, and I am going to show you that you are mistaken.

The gentleman said he got the information from the Postmaster-General. He takes up a paper with a memorandum made by the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and reads that as the indorsement of the Postmaster-General. Unfortunately he found the memorandum there. I do not know how the chairman came to make such a thing, but it is there and has fallen into his hands.

But the chairman says now that he was mistaken when he made the memoranda, while the gentleman from Mississippi read it and charged it to the Postmaster-General. There is the whole question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But the gentleman also read from the Postmaster-General.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And let me say again, and as sensible men you must take my conclusions, that if Mr. Bissell is opposed to the appropriation why does he spend it? He has an option in the matter. It is not incumbent upon him to do so unless he thinks the Government is deriving a benefit from it.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to read what the present Postmaster-General does say with especial reference to this appropriation?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. He says:

The fast-mail service between the North and the South has recently been much enlarged. Following the coast line its extent and rapidity will, commencing with December—be more complete than heretofore.

That is last December—

And then, as to the interior lines, he says:

And by means of the interior lines it has recently been made possible to inaugurate a double daily fast-mail service connecting the great business centers of the North with New Orleans by way of Atlanta and Montgomery. The hours of these trains are those most favored by the Department, and it has thereby been rendered possible to accomplish connections that provide equally well for both letter and daily newspaper mails.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. That does not sound very much like the gentleman from Mississippi. If that does not show beyond all question that my friend from Mississippi is mistaken, I shall not endeavor to enlighten him on that point any further.

But I was saying when interrupted that for seventeen years this mail service has gone on with appropriations ranging from $125,000 up to four hundred and odd thousand dollars. It is the only fast mail we have to the South and Southwest, while the North and the great Northwest have four great trunk lines that carry with lightning speed their mails from East to West and Northwest and back again. We have one, and but one only. And now the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi is to rob us of that.

I want to suggest, while perhaps it has nothing to do at all with the matter under consideration, Mr. Chairman, that very little money comes from the Government in our direction. The great bulk of the pension appropriations go in another direction: the great bulk of the appropriations for fortifications and armament go in another direction; the appropriations for building, arming, and equipping the new Navy for the country go in another direction. The little pitiful amount in the river and harbor bill is the only expense the Government of this great country is called on to-day to incur on account of special favors to the people of the great South and Southwest.

But I would not stand here to-day to ask that this appropriation be made if the Government did not get value received for every single dollar which it spends for these lines. I am no advocate for charity to my people nor charity to any other people. But it is the purpose and the duty of this Government to distribute these mails into every nook and corner of this great country. I want to say if that is a policy which is advisable, as it has been shown to be in the past, we want to participate in it. That is the policy, and has been in operation for many years.

If that policy is to continue, why should you shut out one section of this country, and give it to another. If it is necessary to make a small appropriation to accomplish that purpose, why is that a subsidy? If the word subsidy appertains to this appropriation, it appertains to nine-tenths of all the appropriations made by this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to stop. I want to say that we have 150 Democratic votes in the Electoral College in the section of the country which this line traverses, and if the Democratic party has been or is to be in the future worth anything to this great country of ours, we should have some recognition by this House.

But I am not asking it on that line. I will suggest that the great bulk of the exports that help to make up the wealth of this country are scattered all along this line, from Washington to New Orleans and Galveston. And if we do business successfully and satisfactorily with New York, and with the East, we must have this mail facility. Therefore, from a business standpoint, leaving out the question of politics—and I am more than willing that that should be left out of this matter entirely—we are entitled from a business standpoint to these fast trains and these mail facilities. I yield the balance of my time to my friend from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR].

Mr. GEAR. I simply want to say, Mr. Chairman, that in my judgment it is bad policy to adopt the amendment offered, and thereby strike a blow at this fast-mail service. I myself live on a line of road, the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, over which is carried the great transcontinental mail of the United States. Practically the whole of Iowa is supplied by this great service. These roads are compelled to build special cars. Their time is scheduled by the Government, and if they fail to make their connections and can not give a good excuse they are fined.

Now, I take it for granted that the striking out of this amendment is a blow to the commercial and economic interests of the country over which this North and South fast mail runs. In my country every lateral road accommodates its schedule to these fast trains. At my right here sits a gentleman who gets his mail at a post-office 100 miles from my town, through which this fast-mail train passes. The road leading to his town has accommodated its time to the schedule of the fast mail.

Mr. LOUD. But that fast-mail line does not get any extra pay.

Mr. GEAR. It gets a large amout of pay, but none too much.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Iowa will not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. GEAR. My friend from Fort Dodge [Mr. DOLLIVER] lives 263 miles from my town. He gets his mail by the fast mail running through my town eight hours earlier than he would get it on the line of road on which he is, because that road has not adopted the fast-mail schedule.

Mr. KYLE. To what road does the gentleman refer?

Mr. GEAR. To the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy. Now I take it for granted that this North and South fast mail line is of equal benefit to the people of that country. I understand that the lateral roads crossing and connecting with this line accommodate their schedules to it, so that the coast cities away down to Florida and throughout that country are equally benefited by the system. I assume that the great transcontinental mail through Texas and Arizona to California is also benefited and expedited by that system. The times demand, the business interests of the country demand that the mails should be expedited; that they should have the very best service they can have.

Your Post-Office Department to-day is actually burdened with applications for the establishment of new post-offices. Two hundred and fifty applications a day are coming in, far beyond the capacity of the Department to grant, in accordance with the wishes of the people. Anything that strikes a blow at this fast mail service is, in my judgment, bad policy and bad business principle.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] for five minutes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I should be surprised if the House should indorse an amendment striking out the appropriation for the fast mail service of the South. In my humble judgment the prosperity of the country has been measured by the development of our postal system. It is of the greatest importance not only to the business interests of the country, but to the distribution of general intelligence, that the fast mail routes should be multiplied and not diminished. I have no special interest in the fast mail service along the Southern coast; and yet it can not, it seems to me, be good policy for the Congress of the United States to take from the growing and prosperous commercial centers of the South the facilities that have for so many years been granted to them by the extension of the fast mails.

In our Western country we know by nearly every man's experience the advantages of this system. Throughout the great Mississippi Valley these mail trains have become a permanent and beneficial part of the business system of our people. They facilitate business in every department, and it would appear that the South needs these advantages even more than any other part of the country. I am amazed that my friend from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE], representing a section of the country that, according to all accounts that come to us from that section, shares in a less measure than other sections in appropriations of the public money, should be found here seeking to take from his own people business conveniences that can not be supplied in any other way.

And so, speaking for my own people, I am in favor, not of abolishing these fast-mail facilities, but of extending them. I would like to see a fast mail put on every trunk line, so that the remote hamlets of the West and South may be given the benefits that come from speedy and regular mail service. We ought not too particularly look to the amount of the expense. The whole theory of the postal service is that, regardless of whether the thing is profitable or not, the United States shall distribute the mails to the people of every section and even to the remote villages of the country. I do not desire to see the policy grow up here of curtailing the postal system and defeating every improvement that is suggested by arguments drawn from the fact that it will increase expense. In these things we can easily overwork the virtues of economy, and do more harm than good by unreasonably disabling a postal system which is fast becoming in speed and efficiency a model for the world.

Mr. GEAR. I omitted to say that it is stated that these roads receive subsidies. That is a mistake. They simply receive pay for what they carry. They are compelled to construct cars under the supervision of the Department, fitted up specially as railroad post-offices. These mails are distributed in these cars by a corps of clerks, in my country, and the mails are thrown out when the train is running at a speed of 40 or 50 miles an hour all ready to take to the post-office and distribute in the boxes. And they are forbidden, in my country, to carry any passenger in the mail car. The road can not give a permit, and only the Department can give a permit to ride in the mail car.

Mr. LOUD. They only receive the regular pay.

Mr. GEAR. They only receive the regular pay. It amounts to a large amount of money, but it is only keeping up pari passu with the growth of the country and the growth of the service.

I yield to my friend, Mr. DOLLIVER.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr Chairman, what I desire to say is not in connection with this bill. I have been trying for several days to get an opportunity to present a matter of personal interest; and I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed a few moments just to present this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent, in addressing the committee, that he be permitted to go out of the rule and not confine himself strictly to the matter under debate. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the matter is this: On last Saturday there appeared in the Times of this city a letter given to the public by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] in which he criticised the use I had made, at Denver and other places, of a speech, or a portion of a speech, made by him at Boston on the 25th of last October. I do not want the House to feel that I have done the gentleman any injustice, and I desire to have placed in the RECORD the portion of the speech which I quoted and the criticism. The gentleman says in the letter (which I will ask the Clerk to read in a few moments):

You will notice that the member of Congress in question, instead of quoting the paragraph in question here in Washington, where it could be met, went 2,000 miles west to air it.

The reason the matter was not presented before Congress in the tariff debate was that the speech did not come to my notice until nearly a month after the bill had passed the House. I did not conceive that it was any injustice to a member of this House, especially to so prominent a member as the gentleman from Maine, to quote in any part of the country a speech made under the circumstances at Boston, at a banquet given by the Massachusetts Republican Club. But since I came back I kept the clipping in my desk, and sought an opportunity to present it in the RECORD, not in order that it might be met, because it can not be met, but that the whole public might be able to see what a distinguished member said in a speech made to fit one part of the country, and how strangely it sounds in another part of the country. The gentleman said in the letter:

It was first started by a member of Congress in a speech in Denver. I was somewhat surprised when I read it, for, of course, separated from the context it conveys an entirely incorrect idea.

I will ask the Clerk to read the only part of that speech that I could find touching upon the tariff question, and if there is any other part that throws any light upon the part read I shall be very glad to have it put into the RECORD. The speech from which I quoted was reported, as I supposed, in full in the Boston Herald of October 26, 1893, and in the Boston Journal (a Republican paper), of same date, it was reported in identically the same language. Not only does it give the words, but gives the expressions of "applause," "laughter," and "great applause," etc., with which the speech was punctured by the audience. I ask that the extract be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

This is only one of its phases and one of its forms. If you people in Massachusetts desire to retain the system under which for thirty years you have been prosperous and great, you have got to show it by your votes on election day, and by no uncertain sign. [Applause.]

And let me tell you right here that there is no State so deeply interested as the State of Massachusetts. [Applause.] If it were not for its condition, I should say, "Let these men try it. Let us have the lesson of free trade burned into the quick; and then let us have peace." [Applause.] But when Massachusetts sits around to mourn her destroyed factories, her ruined industries, her ruined machine shops, she sits around to mourn for eternity; for if they are once destroyed, the omnivorous West will do the manufacturing for the country. [Applause.] You have the start; you have the power; you have the prestige. You can keep it, or you can throw it away; and the only way in which you can keep it is by making the voice of the majority of your people to be heard, and to be heard across the country. [Applause.]

The Democratic party to-day is ruled by the South. I do not care anything about the geography of their position—when I say "the South," I mean by men who have no conception whatever of a Northern industrial city [applause], who have no idea of Lowell or Lawrence. That wealth which is diffused from one end of our great towns to another they do not understand; and if you who do understand it—and some of you are dependent for your livelihoods upon it—neglect your duty, you must not be surprised if these men carry out their ideas. Truth is mighty, but so is ignorance. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, in this letter the gentleman says, "The passage occurring in a short extemporaneous speech, with no point elaborated." I hardly think that it can be said that because a speech was extemporaneous, therefore one should not quote from it. Sometimes an extemporaneous speech will present a man's real thoughts better than a prepared speech, and I think that those who read the speech made by the gentleman in Boston will perhaps agree that if he had ever thought it would be reported or read in the West it might have been somewhat modified.

But, extemporaneous as it was, it probably expressed the real sentiment and the real belief of the gentleman who made it. To show that the gist of it was not much changed upon reflection, let me read what the letter says. The letter, I presume, was not extemporaneous. [Laughter.] In the letter he says:

I pointed out to them that the legislation tendered them was foolish; that the low duties of the Wilson bill would destroy their manufactures in common with others, and that when they were once destroyed they would be rebuilt under reëstablished protection, nearer the market and nearer the materials, as cheaply as in New England.

Now, of course, that letter is not extemporaneous. It is a calm statement of a supposed condition that, under equal circumstances, the "omniverous West" would do the manufacturing for the country; that if we could once take away the advantage which New England has in the system now existing and start upon an equal footing, the manufactures of New England would be re-established in the "omniverous West." A little further on he says:

As I said to Massachusetts, I say to all other parts of the country, that enlightened selfishness teaches the doctrine of "live and let live."

I ask those who desire to pursue the subject to read that speech and see whether they can find in it anywhere the idea of "Live and let live." No, sir. It is an appeal to sectionalism. "You have the start; you have the power; you have the prestige; you can keep it or you can throw it away." In other words, if you keep it you can have the advantage of the "omnivorous West," but if you do not not make your voice heard across the country you will lose the artificial advantage given you by law, and when it comes to natural advantages the "omnivorous West" will get ahead of you.

In another place the gentleman says:

Of course such a free list would be very attractive to New England if she acted from pure selfishness.

If you read the portion of the speech devoted to the tariff question you will imagine that pure selfishness is the only thing that can be appealed to in Massachusetts, because it is the only thing the gentleman appeals to there. He calls up the "ignorance" of the South—Massachusetts must beware of that. He calls up the great "omnivorous West"—Massachusetts must be careful about that. In this speech he says that "no State is so deeply interested (in protection) as Massachusetts." Now, sir, that sounds strange in the West. We have been told out there that every State is just as much interested in protection as Massachusetts is

We have been told that protection is just as important to the West as it is to the East, but here is a gentleman who is the acknowledged leader of the Republican party not only in this House, but in the nation, a gentleman who may go some day to the "omnivorous West" and ask its support for the Presidency, says that if it were not for the condition of Massachusetts he would be willing to have free trade. But for that—not the condition of the country, but the condition of Massachusetts—he would be willing to say, "Let these men try it. Let us have the lesson of free trade burned into the quick, and then let us have peace," but for Massachusetts' sake he will not have it. [Laughter.]

But the strange thing about the explanation—which may require more explanation than the original speech—is what the gentleman from Maine, looking back, supposes he had said. I have quoted the portion of the letter in which he says that he "pointed out to them that the legislation tendered them was foolish; that the low duties of the Wilson bill would destroy their manufactures," etc. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a strange thing that that speech not only did not contain a mention of the Wilson bill, not only did not warn them against the "bribe" of free raw material, but the speech was made more than a month before the Wilson bill was reported by the majority of the committee to the minority; it was made at a time when there was no Wilson bill, and when the Democrats did not know what the schedules would be. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, is it not strange that in a prepared criticism, which not only attempts to explain the speech, but even criticises me for using it—is it not strange, that in that prepared letter, the gentleman should have thought that he spoke of a bill which was not in existence until a month after the speech was made? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., April 6, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor received. I have noticed the paragraph you send me making its way over the West. It was first started by a member of Congress in a speech in Denver. I was somewhat surprised when I read it, for, of course, separated from the context, it conveys an entirely incorrect idea. The passage occurred in a short extemporaneous speech, with no point elaborated. It was when the attempt was being made to secure the aid of New England by sacrificing the interests of the West under guise of giving New England free raw material by removing the duty on coal, iron, and wool.

Of course such a free list would be very attractive to New England, if she acted from pure selfishness. But I took occasion in a few words of incomplete statement, but which the audience I addressed perfectly understood, to point out how short-sighted it was for New England to accept the bribe. Already many Massachusetts manufactures had legitimately gone West, and more must do so, the coarser going first. Under these circumstances, perfectly understood by my audience, some short-sighted men were trying, by the promise of free coal, free iron ore, and free wool, to persuade New England that she could monopolize the manufacturing.

I pointed out to them that the legislation tendered them was foolish; that the low duties of the Wilson bill would destroy their manufactures, in common with others, and that when they were once destroyed, they would be rebuilt under reëstablished protection, nearer the market and nearer the materials, as cheaply as in New England. In short, if New England men helped ruin the country, the ruin would be first and most complete for them on their unkindly soil. Such, in my judgment, would be the facs, and this ruin the country can not afford, no matter where the destroyed manufactures are. An idle factory goes to pieces in five years, and to destroy expensive plants and to throw away all the capital involved would mean that the United States, and, most of all, New England, would have to halt in its progress until all these vast sums were reëarned and reinvested.

Manufactures are now steadily and legitimately advancing westward and southward under the present system, and doing so as fast as is consistent with solid material growth. Massachusetts men and other men are already transferring a part of their capital, and in due time, without shock, the Western and Southern manufactories will do their full share of the manufacturing business of the country. The manufacturing of coarse cotton cloths has already gone from New England to the South.

The mighty and "omnivorous" West is truly great in all that will make riches and consumable wealth, and if this destruction called the Wilson bill can be stayed all parts of the country will prosper and capital and labor will not be wasted.

As I said to Massachusetts I say to all other parts of the country, that enlightened selfishness teaches the doctrine of "live and let live."

You will notice that the member of Congress in question, instead of quoting the paragraph in question here in Washington, where it could be met went 2,000 miles west to air it. I am surprised that any man East or West should deem it worth while to credit me with opposition to the Wilson bill because it would build up manufactures in the West, when everybody knows it will destroy all manufactures.

It is the desire and expectation of protectionists that the West and South will follow or even surpass the example of New England in developing manufacturing industries, as they are now fast doing. The Wilson bill will bring the South and West into competition in manufacturing, with wages much lower than their wages, instead of into competition with the higher wages of New England, as now.

Very truly, yours,

T. B. REED.

C. L. VAUGHAN, Esq., Hutchinson, Kans.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is this debate upon the Wilson bill or upon the Hill substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman, if he was not present at the time, that the Chair recognized the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] in his own right for an hour, under the rules; that after speaking for fifteen or eighteen minutes the gentleman from Georgia yielded the remainder of his time to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN]. The gentleman from Nebraska yielded a few minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]; and when the gentleman himself took the floor he asked unanimous consent—in violation of the rule, as the Chair stated—to speak to this matter. There was no objection, and the Chair so stated. The gentleman is in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then it is "this matter" that is under discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not make any difference what the "matter" is; the gentleman has the consent of the committee to speak.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is what we want to know—what is the matter?

A MEMBER (on the Democratic side). You will find out.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, this is put in the RECORD because I would not have the House and the people to whom that letter was addressed by the gentleman (for it was given to the public) think that I have done anything wrong or done any injustice to the gentleman from Maine. I thought it wise to put both the speech from which I quoted and the letter which explains the speech in the RECORD for these reasons, in order that those who read the letter may have the means of knowing whether I was guilty of taking a sentence out of its proper connection, and thereby making it convey an erroneous idea; and also that they may know that I had not spoken of this speech 2,000 miles away and was unwilling to speak of it here "where it could be met."

I wanted the matter put in the RECORD "where it could be met," for fear that some Western Republican might take up the line of argument which the gentleman followed in Massachusetts and address the people on the same line of selfishness. I was afraid that some protectionist out there might appeal to his people, and using the gentleman as authority say, "We have not the start, we have not the power, and we have not the prestige; but if we can once wipe out the tariff, we will get the start, and get the power, and get the prestige." For fear they might do that, I wanted to bring the matter forward here where the gentleman could explain it; so that no protectionist in the West would have an excuse for misunderstanding him or for applying to the Western country the argument which has been, and is, applied to the Eastern country.

We have told them out there that the real purpose of protection is to give the East an advantage; but we never before found the leader of the Republican party willing to say that no State in the Union was "so deeply interested as Massachusetts" in maintaining protection. We have told them that if it were not for the great "combines" which have been built up and which have enabled trusts to drive out new industries, and then under the protection of a tariff recoup themselves out of the pockets of the people, there might be great industries built up in the "omniverous West;" but we never had a great Republican so nearly tell us so before; and I wanted this put in the RECORD so that if there is an explanation of it the people of the West may have it; and if there is no explanation, then let them know that the people who go before them and advocate protection on the ground that it is for the whole country, go down to Massachusetts, and raising up the "ignorance" of the South and the "omniverous West," plead for special privileges for their own industries. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the House at this time must wonder what possible connection there is between the speech of the gentleman from Nebraska and the text which he was kind enough to cause to be read. So far as any misapprehension or misrepresentation by the gentleman from Nebraska of what I said was concerned, I beg to assure him that I should have regarded it as of the slightest possible human consequence, left by itself. The only significance which the matter had arose from the fact that in his discourse at Denver he undertook to turn what had been said by me into a declaration as it were on my part that the Wilson bill would result in building up manufactures in the West to the destruction of manufactures in the East—obviously not what I had said. But if the matter had confined itself to that discourse I should not have thought it worth while to pay any attention to it.

But I found that various Western papers, amid the ruins of the Democratic party, were making a specialty of that little portion of his text. It is necessary for the Democratic party, whether it be in its Populistic form, in the shape of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN], or in the New York or "goldbug" form, or whatever form it may be in, to have some startling lie to come and go on; and I thought therefore that it was simply worth while to state what the facts were in the case, and let the people confront them. I did so. Now, the truth is that anybody here would have laughed at the suggestion, if made on this floor. It became necessary to back it up by making it at a very great distance, and having it have some circulation, to which the gentleman desires to add some further circulation arising from the advertisement which he gives it now.

That is all there is to it; and nobody here would have dreamed of my advocating the destruction of the Wilson bill, or anything that was suggested in the way of a Democratic bill, for the purpose of retaining manufactories in New England, and preventing them from being built up in the West. The gentleman, in one sentence, in one gentle quiver of his voice, suggested that I said it in Massachusetts, and that other people would now have a chance to repeat it elsewhere. I beg leave to say that I have some slight consciousness that what I say gets printed, and that gentlemen from the West and other portions of the country are quite capable of reading it, and consequently the idea does not occur to me that what I say is said in a remote corner. I said it with perfect freedom to that audience as it stood, in an extemporaneous speech, in which I referred to their peculiar condition.

Now, the truth is that long before the Wilson bill was out everybody knew what would be one feature of it. That feature was intended to cajole New England. That was intended to satisfy some gentlemen who had felt that the tariff bill could be modified for their advantage. It proposed to give them free trade in certain raw materials used in manufacturing. I took occasion to point out to that audience—and everybody perfectly understood me—that as they were situated, this boon which it was proposed to give them was utterly unsatisfactory and delusive; that the fact actually would be that if the manufactures in this country were wiped out, from one end of it to the other, that they would naturally be rebuilt nearer to materials, a large portion of them, and consequently if they desired to retain the position which they at present had until it was changed legitimately and satisfactorily to the nation, that they ought to reject that bribe.

Now, was that a disadvantage to the rest of the people of the country? Why, plainly not. It is for the advantage of the people of this country that the present manufactures as they exist shall not be destroyed. There is no danger that the course of empire will cease to take its way westward. There is no doubt about that whatever. Only it ought to do it and will do it in a perfectly legitimate way, without the destruction of capital, and without the ruin of established manufactures, and at the same time to the advantage of the consumer as well.

Just take into account for an instant what would be the result of reverse action. The destruction of manufactures in the United States involves the tremendous destruction of plants. As I have stated once before in this House, one single manufacturing company that I named has property worth five or six millions of dollars. Destroy that industry, and that property is not worth $50,000.

Now, under reorganized and reëstablished protection, sure to follow in case this miserable bill is passed—it is only a question of time—if you are going to rebuild manufactures, you have got to rebuild them with the loss of that capital which already exists, and which no nation in its senses would be foolish enough to throw away.

So far as the increase of manufactures in the West is concerned, that is taking place every day, and is taking place as the result of the increase of wealth made by capital in manufactures in New England and in New York; and pretty soon money which has been earned by manufactures in the State of Illinois will be used to establish manufactures beyond the Mississippi. That is the natural process, sure to go on, and to go on to the great advantage of the whole people of this country.

The Republican doctrine of protection is not a doctrine of the preservation of special interests. That kind of a doctrine is manifest in the present bill that is pending before Congress. The doctrine of the establishment of classes is in that bill; but that is not the doctrine of the Republican party, which is a very simple one. It is the preservation of the American market to the American people, or, stated in other language, that the American people shall do their own work. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 6016, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. COCKRELL on the 4th instant, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1525) for the relief of G. H. Norton, surety on the bond of M. I. Mr. HARRIS. I present communications from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and other officers of the District government in respect to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MARTIN], heretofore reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The papers are to accompany the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The papers will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 489) for the relief of Mary A. Swift, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

OTIS SMITH.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1640) granting a pension to Otis Smith, to report it favorably, without amendment; and as this soldier is 84 years of age, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Otis Smith, of North Cambridge, Mass., late a private in Company D, Twentieth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month, in lieu of that which he now receives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

E. T. CRESSEY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW March 9, 1894, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Printing; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby directed to pay to E. T. Cressey the sum of $1,500 out of the contingent fund of the Senate, for services performed by him in preparing a catalogue of books in the library, including those stored in the basement, and in searching for certain documents of the earlier Congresses, in order to complete the files of the Senate from the beginning of the Government.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WASHBURN introduced a bill (S. 1882) granting a pension to Mary Shumate; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1883) to amend sections 4818, 4821, 4822, and 4823 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and section 4 of an act approved March 8, 1883, entitled "An act prescribing regulations for the Soldiers' Home located at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 1884) for the relief of the administrator of the estate of John Kelly, deceased, late of Alleghany County, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LITTLE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1916) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge Little River, in the State of Arkansas.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The bill is in the usual form. It has already passed the House of Representatives and has been reported favorably to the Senate by the Committee on Commerce with one small amendment. I do not think it necessary to take up the time of the Senate by reading the bill in full.

Mr. MANDERSON. That would be a very startling departure, I think, from the custom of the Senate. The bill being up for consideration, it should be read at length. I have no objection to its consideration, but certainly it should be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had directed the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 28, after the words "such direction, and," to strike out the words "as nearly as practicable;" so as to read:

And if the bridge over the said river shall be constructed as a draw or pivot bridge the draw or pivot pier shall be over the main channel of the river at an accessible navigable point, and the openings on each side of the pivot pier shall not be less than 130 feet in the clear, unless otherwise expressly directed by the Secretary of War, and, if so directed, shall be according to such direction, and the said openings, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 5443) to establish harbor regulations for the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. 5711) to authorize the adoption of children in the District of Columbia.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask the Senate to consider——

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to call up the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. I believe it is a question of privilege. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will not delay it. I think it will take only a few minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes. It is necessary that the bill should be passed at once. There are a great many courts practically suspended for want of funds.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and continued the reading to the clause on page 5, line 2, beginning:

The Commissioner of Labor in charge of the Eleventh Census is hereby directed, etc.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to inquire if that phrase is a proper description of the officer, "the Commissioner of Labor in charge of the Eleventh Census?"

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the proper description. He is the Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. HOAR. I understand; but the phrase used in the bill is "the Commissioner of Labor in charge of the Eleventh Census."

Mr. COCKRELL. The Commissioner of Labor is simply detailed to take charge of the census.

Mr. HOAR. He is not charged with the census?

Mr. COCKRELL. He is absolutely so. There is no other Superintendent of the Census.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. I did not know that.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like some information with reference to the proposed printing of the census. My recollection is that by legislation heretofore had we have ordered printed a very large quantity of what is known as the Compendium of the Census, and one volume of that Compendium has been issued. I understand there are to be in all three volumes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Three large volumes, I understand.

Mr. MANDERSON. Three large volumes. We are also to have, I think by legislation heretofore had, a digest or abstract. Now is it proposed to furnish another abstract or digest such as is recited in the paragraph in relation to the census? If so, what is the necessity for it? I really think the Treasury is groaning, and those who are to be the recipients of those volumes for distribution will groan under the tremendous number of these books in different forms, which are to be issued for distribution to the public. I should like some explanation of the necessity for this provision and just what the character of the work is to be.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is a member of the Committee on the Census and is familiar with the subject. As I understand this is to be a compendium to be prepared, giving the results of the comparisons of the entire census in such form that it will be of practical use to everybody, and it is to be printed at an early date.

Mr. HALE. The situation is just this: Old Senators will remember that the great trouble about any of the census work has always been that we do not get at the results for the people for years and years after the census is taken. It is now going on to four years since the census was taken.

As the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] has said, there is a compendium provided for, which will cover pretty much all that anybody will want of the work. Then there is a digest.

The trouble, however, about these is that neither will be ready for from a year to two years from now, and it was thought by the House of Representatives and by the Senate committee in conference with Mr. Wright, who has charge of the census—it all having been turned over to him by law—that if a convenient, handy volume, not over 250 pages, covering population statistics and things sought by everybody, could be prepared and issued during the next three months it would meet a great want, not being expensive, although additional to what was originally contemplated. The House and the Senate Committee approved it, and that is what is in the bill.

There will be 100,000 copies of this little work ready for distribution in August, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it will answer the calls and letters which Senators have received.

The great census work, covering so many volumes, will only be valuable to students, scholars, libraries, and specialists; but no man can tell when it will be ready. I have had some experience in trying to run two of these different census works, and unless when the next census comes around something is done to limit the scope of the work, we may as well understand that the great volumes comprising the whole will be only used by a few people, and will not be got out for five or six years after the census is taken.

Mr. MANDERSON. I presume the bill is being read not for amendment, but that the reading is as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is being read as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANDERSON. When the proper time shall come for amendments to be proposed, I shall either move to strike out the clause to which I have referred or to very materially amend it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to enter into a general discussion of this very important matter of the census on a deficiency bill, and when this comparatively small matter is up; but after what has been said by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], I desire to say that, in my judgment, the sooner we can reform our census policy in the direction in which it is tending every day the better.

I think we ought to have a census of the population of this country once in five years, unless the States will supplement the national census, as the State of Massachusetts does, by a State census in the middle of the decade; and that the census in regard to all other matters of public information ought to be going on all the time; that we ought to have frequent bulletins announcing the new information, so that we should have, by the highest authority and at the Government cost, all the tables of information we depend upon for our economic, financial, and social legislation brought up to the latest time. Now we have them but once in ten years, and we do not get the result of a ten-years' census till four or five years after the time to which it relates. So that practically we depend upon magazines, private enterprise, and statistical societies for very often inaccurate and always imperfect information upon which our most important legislation is to depend.

If we comply with the Constitution by having our census of population once in ten years, the improved modern methods can give us the result of the mere ascertainment of population in a very few weeks, certainly in a very few months, after the 1st of June, or whatever date is fixed, of the year in which the census is taken, so that it would not be necessary, as now, to postpone our new apportionment for Representatives for two years.

Then, it seems to me, we ought to have a bureau in the Interior Department, which during all the time is collecting the information that we need up to date. It would somewhat increase the direct and immediate expense, but it would save a hundred expenditures which we are authorizing constantly from time to time.

Mr. STEWART. With regard to the same matter, I think that a permanent bureau of statistics is one of the most important subjects that can be taken under consideration. There are partial bureaus of that kind scattered through all the Departments. We have in the Treasury Department, in the Interior Department, and in the Agricultural Department various schemes for collecting statistics, and when we get them, they relate to isolated subjects which do not give us the advantage of using the information, because we have not the whole question before us for comparison.

I believe that the statistics should be consolidated under one head, and the investigation of statistics should be going on all the time, because we want to know at each session how different legislation is operating and what the condition of the country is at the time we legislate. That is impossible under the arrangement we now have.

As to the taking of the census of population, that should be done separately. Nothing else should intervene with the attempt to take the census of population. To ask people to answer a long list of questions defeats the entire object. The people do not understand the bearing of many of the questions, and they do not like to be catechised in such a manner.

If the census related merely to the number of people, and no other information was gathered on that occasion, the census of population could be taken with great accuracy; it could be done expeditiously, and the collecting of other information to be used here should go on constantly. If the work of the census is to be of any use, we want to have current information which we can use in legislation. To go back ten years to ascertain the condition, when there has been an entire change, is obviously useless. We make very little use of the census reports from the fact that they are ancient when the work is completed.

If the census could be consolidated under one head and the different bureaus engaged in collecting statistics could be consolidated, I do not think that the expense would be greatly increased. I believe it could be done at the present cost; and I think we could get useful information with regard to all the subjects and have it current when Congress meets.

We are expending a large amount of money in collecting information now in the various Departments by various individuals, and this scattered work is very unsatisfactory. It does not give us the information we need. If we had the kind of organization I have suggested going on all the time, it could arrange for enumerating the population at the proper time; we should have a nucleus from which to start, and machinery which would employ the requisite number of persons to take the census, without incurring nearly as much expense as we now incur. I think the scattered way of collecting statistics which the country has fallen into is a great error. The collection of statistics should be systematized under one head.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to make a statement in response to the suggestion he has made?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Nebraska referred to the digest which the existing law requires to be made, and seemed to think that this preparation would be an unnecessary expense beyond and above the digest. I want to read to him what Col. Wright, in charge of the census, said of this in connection with the digest, and the Senator will then see the propriety of the provision in the bill. Col. Wright's statement is in response to questions by Mr. CANNON, Mr. HENDERSON, and other members of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives. Col. Wright said:

> You see, the law of the census now provides for 50,000 copies of the digest; my plan then would be to make this abstract so complete, as far as it went, so it would form the plates, type, etc., for that digest already provided by law, so that there would be no extra expense so far as that goes. If you give me until the 1st of August I can go pretty near through.

So what is provided for in the bill will only be a part of what will be in the digest.

Mr. MANDERSON. Does Col. Wright say how many copies of the Compendium are to be published?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; he does not give the number, because he does not refer to the Compendium; but there are three volumes, the same number now authorized by the census law. The Senator will, therefore, see that this provision is only to get this part of the digest out so that we may have it for use this summer.

Mr. MANDERSON. The census of 1860, taken with very considerable care, ran into a very large number of volumes in the completed work. The Compendium, as I will call it, was, as to that particular census, but one volume. I think that was true also of the Compendium of the census of 1870.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Compendium of the Census of 1870 was in one volume.

Mr. MANDERSON. When we came to the Census of 1880, the Compendium was a two-volume octavo work.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was a work of that size [indicating].

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes; that is an octavo in two volumes.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was printed so as to make two volumes, but I think some were issued in one volume. Two volumes were contemplated.

Mr. MANDERSON. The form in which it was issued was a two-volume octavo work, but the general census reports had swollen to be an immense number; my recollection is, some eighteen or nineteen volumes in all.

Mr. COCKRELL. Twenty-odd.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes; perhaps twenty volumes. One very great complaint in the debate that ensued upon the legislation incident to the Census of 1890 was that these two works were so voluminous, and that there were so many of them, that their extent prevented their speedy issue. The experience of every man after a census is taken is that it shows the Government work to be very poor in comparison to that which comes from private enterprise.

To-day, if a man wants to consult some matter pertaining to the census he does not pick up the Compenium; he does not pick up any of the volumes already issued, only two or three in number, even if he knows that within their voluminous extent he would probably, after much searching, find the particular matter that he desires. He picks up that which comes by private enterprise, the almanacs of the different daily newspapers of the country. They contain within their lids just the information that is needed, and it comes quickly. Take the almanacs published by the great newspapers of New York City, those of the World, the Times, the Tribune, and you will find in them exactly what is needed as to the general statistics of population, and running into a degree of detail that is of enormous value, affording, as I say, a very unpleasant contrast to the work that is being done under Government direction.

Now, the thing seems to grow on that upon which it feeds. Here, instead of a Compendium is a volume that has assumed the form of a quarto, almost as large in its dimensions as any one of the main census reports. We are told that this first volume of Compendium is one of three tremendous volumes that are to be issued, and to be issued during the next three or four years (the final volume probably coming to us when we are making preparations for the Census of 1900); to an extent, for distribution, as I recall it, 100,000 to 150,000 copies. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] can probably give the exact number that we are to issue of this ponderous three volume Compendium.

In addition to the census we are to have 50,000 copies of a digest. It is a most extraordinary thing that here is a Compendium that is supposed to take the cream of the census and give it to us in convenient form, and that Compendium is to be digested and the digest is then to be abstracted. Here, in addition to the twenty or thirty enormous volumes that shall constitute the census and shall come to us through the coming generations, we are to have these numerous volumes that are to be called the Compendium, the Digest, and the Abstract. What is to be the name of the fourth volume that shall contain the cream of that which is in the Digest, I for one can not imagine, but I presume some apt term will hereafter be found, and in an appropriation bill we shall have perhaps provision made for a syllabus of the digest; and we shall have the Compendium, the Abstract, the Digest, and the Syllabus for distribution.

It seems to me that this is a waste of the public money—that the better thing to have done would have been to publish this Compendium, which should be in one volume, and let that be the end of it.

I am glad to see this limitation as to the time when the abstract shall be completed, that it shall be ready for distribution on or before the 1st day of August. I wish, if this paragraph is to be retained in the bill, that the limitation shall be made more imperative, and that the preparation of the abstract shall not go on in the Census Bureau unless it is positive that the book can be printed and ready for distribution within the next three months. I think the Government of the United States would do better work if it would take some of the numerous publications that have emanated from the private presses of the country and distribute them, in preference to this weary waiting to get that which is so voluminous and comes from the Census Office.

Mr. COCKRELL. While this discussion is not pertinent to the provision in regard to a permanent Census Office and what character of books the Census Office should publish, I have no doubt the distinguished Superintendent of the Eleventh Census, Col. Porter, did the very best he could under the circumstances, and he literally followed the regulations and prescriptions of Congress. Here is the law that authorized and required him to make these publications, and authorized them to be in parts. It is the fault of Congress if they permitted or directed him to go on and make such publications.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, I will state that my reflection is upon ourselves; it is upon the Congress of the United States rather than upon the executive officers who have followed out the behests of Congress. But what I protest against is that we should go further in this objectionable legislation and compel additional and unnecessary work by those who are in charge of the census and must execute the recorded will of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. We are not compelling additional work, but as I read from this extract, and as the Senator will recall, we are only requiring this work to be done by the 1st of August, and furnished to us. It will then be completed in the Digest. It is simply a publication of a part of the Digest at an earlier date than we would otherwise get it.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at line 16, on page 5, and read to line 22 on page 6.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question at this point. What likelihood is there of the Census Bureau performing its work and going out of existence at the expiration of the time fixed in the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think we can rely upon it with absolute certainty. Col. Wright, who is in charge of the work, thinks he can complete it by that time. That is the period allowed him, and judging from the work that he has heretofore done I should say he will finish it by that time.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri another question. Does he know of any data, plates, or material gathered for the census reports which have been destroyed or are being destroyed?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is a question that would take up some considerable time. I suppose I know to what the Senator from Nebraska refers. I spoke to Col. Wright on that identical subject, and I have an explanation from him. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] I believe has the paper. If the Senator from Nebraska will read the explanation he will be satisfied on that question. There has been no destruction I understand, but I do understand that Col. Porter in certain publications of the census where copious extracts had been made from Government publications already published and issued, simply had them stricken out in order to save space and reduce the volume of the work. I hope the Senator will look at the letter I have referred to. I have not got it; I gave it to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. What is it the Senator from Nebraska is inquiring about? We on this side of the Chamber could not hear a word he said.

Mr. ALLEN. I asked the Senator from Missouri if he knew of any destruction of plates, reports, or data of various kinds in the Census Bureau and the failure to publish them as required by the original census act; and to that question the Senator made his reply.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not understand that there has been any destruction. I suppose I know to what the Senator from Nebraska refers. It is about the Indian publications. I stated to the Senator that I spoke to Col. Wright about it, and he wrote me a letter, which I had and which the Senator from New Hampshire now has, explaining exactly what was done, and showing the whole thing. There was no destruction.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand that any valuable and completed information of any kind has been destroyed. In the course of the work certain statistics, which it was expected would be made more complete, cover more ground and cause the publication of larger volumes, were restricted and cut down; but I have yet to learn that any valuable information or statistics have been either destroyed or suppressed. I do not think that is the case, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HAWLEY. As the Senator from Missouri intimates, this matter will probably be discussed later. I think there has been an unwarranted liberty taken with some of the reports that were entirely completed and approved by the Superintendent of the Census and the Secretary of the Interior before the beginning of this Administration. They have been re-edited and cut down, and yet I suppose the name of the original compiler, the officer responsible, remains attached to them. Some of those gentlemen who are of the very highest character and prepared under Mr. Porter's direction what they considered very valuable reports have felt themselves very much aggrieved. I do not propose to spend time upon that matter now, but a few weeks ago I offered a resolution of inquiry as to the delay in the publication of the reports on manufactures which were going to be and are greatly needed in the discussion of the pending tariff bill.

The answer to the resolution adopted by the Senate is unsatisfactory and indefinite. But Mr. Wright orally assured me that he would make haste, and we have had in pieces some very interesting reports on manufactures. But the regular annual report of the Secretary of the Interior submitted last December shows that on the 31st day of July, 1893, nearly nine months ago, of the report on manufactures there were 328 pages completed and 328 pages in type; and we are just getting extracts. I am not at all satisfied with various things of that kind done in connection with the report, but we can discuss that question hereafter, if it be necessary.

Mr. COCKRELL. In connection with this matter, and in explanation of the inquiry made by the Senator from Nebraska, I will not take the time this morning to read the communications from Col. Wright, but I will ask that they be printed in the RECORD. I have no objection to their being printed as a separate, little miscellaneous document. I think they had better be printed in that way, but I prefer that they should go in the RECORD, as they simply explain how he has been editing this matter and what has been left out.

Mr. HOAR. I think, after the question which has been put and after what has been said by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], those statements, which are very brief and clear, should not only be printed in the RECORD, but should be read in the hearing of the Senate. I should think it would be more economical in the way of time to go on and dispose of this subject now instead of cutting it in two, between two days. If the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] will wait fifteen minutes before he takes the floor, we might dispose of the appropriation bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I prefer not. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] gave notice that he intended to address the Senate at this time. I give notice that I will ask the Senate to take up the bill again immediately after 5 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator from Missouri that I am entirely willing he shall have his way.

Mr. COCKRELL. I prefer not to go on with the bill now.

Mr. HARRIS. I prefer that at 1 o'clock we shall go on under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall not ask the Senate to set aside the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HOAR. I did not rise to interfere with the Senator's control of the time or manner touching his own bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that.

Mr. HOAR. But I should like to have the matter read to which the Senator from Missouri has alluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. We shall have it read immediately after 5 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have it read in the hearing of the Senate at some time in the debate.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 4864.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine to allow me to occupy the attention of the Senate for just a moment on a matter that is somewhat personal.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know whether the explanation or the statement that I feel called upon to make is a personal or a political one, but at all events I think it is called for. I quote from the New York Evening Post of a recent date as follows:

> The Hill-Gorman-Pugh school of Democrats in the Senate, who are trying to block tariff reform, ought to have their eyes opened by the address issued by the Minnesota Democratic Association yesterday. This is exactly the sort of pronunciamento which is needed, because it names the offenders, the two Democratic Senators from New York, the two from New Jersey, the two from Maryland, the two from Alabama, the two from Louisiana, Camden of West Virginia, and Brice of Ohio. "These are the men," says the address—

Quoting from that address—

> "who wear the mask of Democrats that they may the better betray our cause. These are they who have wrought this marvelous change, putting our party in the attitude of defeat, and giving to our opponents that of victory."

The New York Post proceeds:

> There is no doubt that the sentiment of Democrats generally throughout the country is expressed in the denunciation of these offenders, and it is to be hoped that this sentiment may find similar expression from many States.

That is the French method of trying a man in his absence and without serving notice and a copy of the indictment upon him. I have the opportunity now, however, and I think it is my duty, to enter a plea of not guilty to that accusation from Minnesota, which was doubtless manufactured here and sent to Minnesota.

I am satisfied with the bill now taken up by the Senate as it came from the Senate committee. I propose to vote for it without any amendment whatever, so far as I now know, and if our friends on the other side want to unnecessarily delay action on the bill or proceed in the line of filibustering, and will notify me of that purpose, I will take occasion to do as I have done oftentimes before with them, I will sit up several nights consecutively, in order to accommodate them with the opportunity of speaking and voting upon the bill.

I was a tariff reformer, I suppose, before the gentlemen who have issued this diatribe against me were born, and I have never in the least degree relaxed my purpose or my desire to have in the United States a fair, equitable, just system of tariff taxation which shall bear equally upon all persons as far as we can make it do so, and which shall not contain one single item of bounty to any person in this country. That is what I have to say about it.

Mr. HALE. If any other Senator who is in this Minnesota list desires to state his position upon this important bill, I will yield with pleasure, even though it should consume considerable time and be open possibly to the suggestion that those Senators may be filibustering. I am not anxious to go on if anything of that kind is sought to be put before the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me for morning business?

Mr. HALE. For a personal explanation?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. For morning business.

Mr. BLACKBURN. He is not one of them.

Mr. HALE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

[Mr. JONES of Arkansas submitted a report, which appears in its appropriate place in to-day's proceedings.]

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to give notice that I shall hereafter object to morning business or any other business being injected while we are proceeding under the consent rule of yesterday.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Tennessee of course would not exclude the confessional, if any Senator desires to make a personal explanation.

Mr. HARRIS. When the Senator from Maine yielded to the Senator from Alabama it was in the nature of debate upon the tariff bill, I understand, and not a violation of the rule.

Mr. HALE. I so considered it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine will proceed.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, since my service in Congress began six different general tariff bills have been reported to Congress, and discussed by its two branches, awakening always a deep interest among the people whose business and everyday life and prosperity were affected by the provisions of the different bills.

It is not possible that any tariff bill, dealing with the diversified industries of the United States, and changing existing laws under which business and labor have adjusted themselves, could be reported and discussed in Washington without awakening this deep interest. But I think I am entirely safe in making the statement that at no time during these twenty-five years, has any tariff billl, or, indeed, I may say all tariff bills, aroused so deep a feeling among the American people and so strong and earnest and determined opposition as the tariff bill now before the Senate, known the world over as the Wilson tariff bill.

Nearly every Senator about me will bear me out in saying that his mail is loaded with protests against the provisions of the bill; that he is waited upon daily by delegations of his constituents who are alarmed at the effect of the bill should it ever pass; and that by private correspondence, by the newspapers, by visits to Washington of thousands of people at whose material interests the bill strikes, the whole country has lifted up its voice wherever the bill has to this time been considered in a loud but thus far ineffectual protest against the bill.

The reasons for this are not hard to discover. Aside from the theories and doctrines upon which it is claimed that the provisions rest, and beyond the indignant opposition which some of its remarkable features have evoked, the people of the United States are being educated by observation and experience in the conditions of everyday life to a more thorough understanding of the relation which all of our industries bear to each other.

The doctrine of protection to American labor and American industries, as affected by competition with foreign labor and foreign industries, is every year more and more plainly seen to involve no preference for one kind of labor above another. The system of protection is seen to be not one for the manufacturer alone; but as manufactures are inbred with the life and interests of all the people, other great industries have been learning the lesson that when you strike at the manufacturer, you strike at the merchant who sells his wares, at the carrier who transports the product, at the farmer who finds, in the home market which prosperous manufacture opens to him, his best resort when he seeks to dispose of the product of his own labor.

The better understanding to-day of the interdependence of all American industries, each upon the other, and the menace which overhangs these industries, thus connected by a common bond of interest, in the calamitous accession to power of the Democratic party through the elections in 1892, all this has brought out from the lakes to the Gulf and from seashore to seashore such an expression of wrathful denunciation of the provisions of the bill now before the Senate as neither House nor Senate nor the American people nor the world has ever before seen.

I do not propose, Mr. President, in what I may say to-day, to address myself to the general considerations that underlie the doctrines which animate the two great political parties of this country. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] did that so admirably, in the speech which he delivered here yesterday, that I do not need to go into that domain. I shall rather give my attention and try to bring to the consideration of Senators certain, thus far, unexplained weaknesses of the bill, certain manifest and unpardonable inconsistencies in its make-up, and certain deplorable cases where, if the bill is not changed but passes as reported by the Senate committee, destruction of home industries will be the result and waste and desolation will be substituted thereby for comfort and prosperity which now prevail under existing law.

Before this debate shall come to an end, Mr. President, I desire and in this I express a general wish, or perhaps what I may call curiosity, that some Senator, who stands in the relation of sponsor to this bill, shall state to the Senate and to the country the general theory or doctrine or proposition or party dogma upon which the bill is framed and presented to the Senate. Going more into detail, I ask that some Senator who undertakes this task shall tell us upon what ground the Senate committee has adopted certain changes which have been made in the Wilson bill as it passed the House.

For myself, Mr. President, I am free to say that while I am familiar with, and believe that I can fairly construe, the tariff plank in the last platform of the Democratic party, as propounded by the Chicago convention of 1892, and the letter of acceptance of President Cleveland which followed, I find myself hopelessly confused and lost in the attempt which I have made to reconcile either or both of these with the provisions of the bill, either as passed by the House of Representatives or as tinkered and manipulated by the Senate committee, which has upon its back the burden of the bill which is now before us.

I read here the tariff-for-revenue plank adopted by the last Democratic national convention at Chicago, with no further comment upon it except to say, what everybody knows, that it was passed by a large majority vote over the report of the committee which had charge of the subject, which in its report recognized the existence of American industries, their dependence in some degree upon the protective system, and the difference in the price of labor in this and in foreign countries:

> We denounce Republican protection as a fraud, a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few. We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purposes of revenue only, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of the Government when honestly and economically administered.

I also read that portion of President Cleveland's letter of acceptance of the nomination touching this question:

> We wage no exterminating war against any American interests. We believe a readjustment can be accomplished in accordance with the principles we profess without disaster or demolition. We contemplate a fair and careful distribution of necessary tariff burdens rather than the precipitation of free trade. We will rely upon the intelligence of our fellow-countrymen to reject the charge that a party comprising a majority of our people is planning the destruction or injury of American interests.

I might ask, Mr. President, contenting myself with that, and awaiting reply, before going into details, that some Democratic Senator should inform me upon which propositions or upon what combination or intermixture of these two charts, laid out for the course of the Democratic party, this bill, either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate committee, has been built up. But I will go further and try to point out some of the things in this bill which the business interests of the country and its laboring population are to-day contemplating with a spirit of resentment and indignation which, wherever it has had an opportunity, has already made itself known, and which will speak in thunder tones in the national elections of the coming autumn.

The doctrines of the authors of the Wilson bill and their purposes, and the dangers attendant thereon, were well known to the American people in November last, and they gave voice to their distrust and apprehension, in no uncertain way, in the elections of that month; but it needed the embodiment of all the vicious and offensive propositions, to which the free-trade Democracy is committed as found in the Wilson bill, to produce a situation in that Gibraltar of Democracy, New York City, when that party barely succeeded in carrying the day in a Congress district where, at the last election, it prevailed by 11,000 majority, and lost another district, which it had carried by more than 9,000 majority, and a little later, in the State of Pennsylvania, where the normal majority of the Republican party was more than trebled, and the Democratic party, as represented by the Wilson tariff bill, was buried in the avalanche which the people of that State piled up to the extent of nearly 200,000 majority. The overwhelming defeat of the Democratic party in Rhode Island, which State it carried last year, is due to the same causes.

Mr. MANDERSON. And in New Jersey yesterday.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Nebraska calls my attention to the elections in New Jersey yesterday. So I might refer to the elections along the Hudson River. In fact, from the time that this bill has been reported to the present hour and moment in which I speak there has been no day in which elections might not be pointed to showing the revolt of an aroused people against the provisions of the bill that is now before the Senate.

Before, Mr. President, going into details touching the remarkable provisions of this bill, let me say that I, in common with other Senators and with thousands of the American people, have studied the bill with painful attention in order to find out any reason or cause for its provisions, and I am compelled to say that from this study three things become to me apparent.

First, it is a bill to protect the South and to punish the North;

Second, it is a bill for the benefit of the European manufacturer and producer at the expense of our own manufacturer and producer;

Third, and this touches my own State, it is, in every paragraph that deals with the products of the Dominion of Canada, as brought in competition with the products of our own people along the Canadian border, a simon-pure, almost unadulterated bill for the benefit of Canada and to our corresponding hurt.

After the bill reached this House, till the day that the Finance Committee reported it, the people of the North apprehended these results. The make-up of the Finance Committee of this body and the evident determination that every item in the bill should be settled by the action of the majority members of the committee, a determination carried out as I am informed, to this extent, that upon not a single amendment was a formal vote of the whole committee taken, but that everything was settled in the conclave of Democratic members, was all in line with these propositions; and it is no wonder that a profound feeling of alarm penetrated the entire country when it was realized that the consideration of a tariff bill touching the industries of 70,000,000 people was committed practically to the hands of three or four Senators from Southern States, who, whatever may be their merit and their high character, had not, either from their own observation or the conditions of their people, had any opportunity to realize the magnificent growth and extent of the manufacturing industries of the North.

I give here some of the statistics, showing the result of the great national census of the year 1890.

The value of the manufacturing product of all the States in the Union, as shown by this census, is $9,370,000,000.

The total value of the product of the fifteen Southern States, including Maryland, is $1,202,000,000, or about 12 per cent of the whole.

The product of the State of New York is $1,712,000,000, or $500,000,000 more than the product of the entire South.

The product of Pennsylvania is $1,331,000,000, or more than $100,000,000 in excess of all the Southern States. And there are several cases where the product of two other Northern States exceed that of the entire South.

The wages paid to the manufacturing industries of the entire nation amounted to $2,283,000,000, of which the Southern States paid a little less than one-eighth.

New York paid twice as much for wages as the entire South.

Pennsylvania, alone, exceeded all payments made in the South for wages.

It is no wonder, in the face of these figures, that the country has viewed with alarm the fact that the construction of this bill, and of every amendment which has thus far been added to it, were in the hands of men representing a section of the country which has a limited interest in its great industries, and who may be presumed to have devoted their lives to other investigation, and to be in condition where it is impossible to appreciate the magnitude of that swelling tide of manufacturing industry which has made the Northern portion of this Republic the wonder and the praise of the civilized world.

Mr. President, not to take up too much of the time of the Senate, let me present a few only of the instances in which this bill discriminates in favor of the South and against the North, although the bill is full of them, from its beginning to its end.

A prominent agricultural product of the South, but a product to a large extent also of other countries, and therefore always made the subject of tariff legislation, is the article of rice. The much condemned and denounced McKinley bill, which looked with an equal eye upon the products of labor North and South, provided for a duty on this article, as follows: "Cleaned rice, 2 cents per pound; uncleaned rice, 1½ cents per pound; paddy, three-quarters of a cent per pound; rice flour and rice meal, one-quarter of a cent per pound."

The Wilson bill, whose provisions in this matter have been followed by the Senate committee, as found in the bill now before us, provides for the following duties: "Cleaned rice, 1½ cents per pound," a reduction of one-fourth of the duty; "uncleaned rice, 1 cent per pound," a reduction of one-fifth of the duty; "paddy, three-quarters of a cent per pound," which is the same as the McKinley bill; "rice flour and rice meal, one-quarter of a cent per pound," also the same.

In looking over, for some corresponding agricultural product of the North, out of several I select the article of hay. The treatment of this great staple product, under the McKinley bill and the Wilson bill and the Senate committee, shows as follows: Under the McKinley bill the duty upon hay is $4 per per ton. The Wilson bill, as it passed the House, reduced this to $2 per ton, and the Senate committee has laid its destructive hand on this product and, not content with the reduction which the Wilson bill had made of 50 per cent of the duty, has substituted, for the House provision of $2 per ton, an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent, which, under the invoicing which will be made in foreign ports, from which these articles will be imported, would be an equivalent of from $1 to $1.40 per ton. A revenue of nearly half a million of dollars annually is almost all given up on this article.

In the article of sugar, which the McKinley bill presented free to every breakfast table in the land, providing a bounty for the Southern producer for this almost entirely Southern product, the Senate committee has largely restored the old duty, thereby putting up the price of the article to every consumer; has repealed the bounty given to the Southern planter, upon the avowed plea that the revenue tariff from taxed sugar is needed in the Treasury, and upon the consideration, well understood by everybody, that if this should not be done the votes of the two Senators from the sugar-planting State of Louisiana could not be reckoned upon in aid of the passage of the bill through this body.

In looking for a corresponding article largely of Northern production, as is sugar largely a Southern production, I find the great industry of lumber, and I contrast the treatment which this article has received at the hands of the Democratic House of Representatives and the Democratic Committee of Finance of the Senate with what I have just stated has been accorded to sugar. In magnitude, indeed, the Southern industry bears no comparison with the Northern industry.

The total value of the sugar product, including all refining, is $123,000,000, while the great lumber industry of the country, largely found in the Northern States, amounts to the enormous sum of $553,349,127, standing at the head of the great products of the country, being higher than either iron and steel, slaughtering and meat-packing, and flouring, while the yearly wages paid rise to the high figure of $135,754,513.

Upon this great article the House of Representatives and the Finance Committee of the Senate have given up the revenue of $1,100,000 yearly from foreign importations and have, with ruthless hand, placed every form of lumber, with the exception of a trivial portion known as planed lumber, upon the free list.

This act is made the more unreasonable and cruel by the fact that the McKinley bill, in dealing with this great product, instead of increasing the duties largely reduced them, in many cases to the extent of 50 per cent, before that bill was made up.

Later on, when I come to consider the provisions of this bill which our Canadian neighbors, if they did not formulate, have at least most gratefully accepted, I shall speak more fully of this great industry.

RECIPROCITY.

The provisions of the bill which strike down the whole scheme of reciprocity, under which additional trade has been growing up with foreign countries, strike most severely at the Northern wheat-grower and the Northern miller, and will at one blow destroy the trade which has grown up with Cuba, and will besides shut out from the German market the already established and increasing exportation from the Northern packing establishments of pork to that country.

The whole scheme of reciprocity and the marked success attending it since it was first adopted during President Harrison's Administration, and under the guiding hand of Secretary Blaine in the State Department, will be fully aired later in the debate, and I do not at this time go deeply into this subject, contenting myself with illustrating the view in which it is held by our Southern neighbors on the American continent, by quoting from the utterance within the last two or three days of Mr. Samuel Well, a leading merchant of Bluefields, Nicaragua, who has just arrived in this country for the purpose of laying the situation there before the Administration.

This is what Mr. Well says, and his indorsement of reciprocity is all the more pregnant because it comes as an incident to his errand:

It is not generally understood in this country that Americans have interests in the community valued at $2,000,000, and that the amount of the export and import trade between that country and the United States reaches the sum of $4,000,000 annually. Not only that, but this trade has been increasing by leaps and bounds. It will, with anything like protection for ourselves, reach an enormous sum annually in comparatively few years. It is really a trade worth cultivating, and we think that this Government, which has been pronounced for reciprocity and encouraging Pan-American Congresses, can carry out those ideas in no better way than to protect its citizens who have gone there and invested their all in trade which is to benefit not only themselves, but that country and this country.

The merits of the reciprocity scheme, which has already increased our trade with Cuba from $11,000,000 to $24,000,000, and with Brazil from $7,000,000 to $16,000,000, without going into the figures in other countries, will be fully considered and thoroughly discussed when that part of the bill is reached.

The same curious feature of so framing tariff legislation as to get votes in the Senate, to which I have referred in treating of the sugar duties, is again found in the conduct of the committee in its treatment of reciprocity, where the ax has been made to descend in such a way that the Hawaiian treaty has been saved in order that the vote of a Democratic Senator from the Pacific Slope should not be lost when the bill comes up for passage.

INCOME TAX AND WHISKY.

The revival of the war income tax, with all its offensive features, of inquiry into private business, of increased swarms of Federal officers, of enforced visits of the tax collector, with its inducements and invitations to frauds, imposes its burdens almost entirely, with only exceptions enough to prove the rule, upon Northern incomes and Northern business and Northern families and Northern property.

The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], in the remarkable speech which he delivered here on Monday, a speech to which all Senators listened with respectful attention, and which once for all established the courage and ability of the man who made it, went so fully into the discussion of the details of the income tax that I do not need to say more now upon it.

In contrast to this, the Kentucky distiller and producer has his interests most carefully guarded and protected, and his accumulated stock is cared for by the provisions of paragraphs 82 to 100, inclusive, as found in the Senate amendment to the House bill, the operation of which has been already explained by the Senator from Iowa.

Upon the proposition, Mr. President, that this bill discriminates generally against American products, American manufactures, and American labor and in favor of European products, manufactures, and labor, I will not here go into the details of the different schedules of the bill, because I desire to approach and consider at some length my last proposition that the bill is made up wholly in the interest of our Canadian neighbors and rivals; but, speaking generally, the portions of the bill that relate to the manufactures of cotton and wool, including the production of raw wool, agricultural implements, tin plate and tinware, leather, knit goods, iron and steel, glass and glassware, pottery, and numerous others, all show the abandonment of our own labor and the preference given to the foreigner.

The utterances of English newspapers, and their gushing approval of the Wilson bill when its provisions became known in Europe, show clearly how these things are regarded. The London Standard declared that it would be the fault of English enterprise and English industry if that country did not derive the fullest benefit from the bill. The London Daily Telegraph, after learning what was contained in the bill, gave vent to the following utterance:

The reforms proposed in the new tariff bill are of the highest importance to the commerce of the world. They mean an economic revolution in the United States.

That economic revolution means the reduction of wages in this country, the gradual adoption of free trade, and the basis of our social fabric established after the English fashion.

Perhaps the best proof of the effect of this bill upon the great manufacturing industries of the country, which are to be affected by European competition, is found in the general blight which has already fallen upon manufactories of the different kinds which I have mentioned, owing to the apprehension of the passage of the bill, and the conviction of the dire results which will attend its passage.

I have an incomplete list of these establishments which, under the menace of the Wilson bill, have either stopped work or cut down their product and their wages; but I will not here put this upon record, only illustrating their extent by reading from a dispatch, dated Fall River, Mass., April 1, showing the fate of the largest manufactory of fine cloths in the whole country.

The authors of the Wilson bill in the House of Representatives, and the Senator from Indiana and his associates on the Finance Committee, may find this interesting reading, as showing the result of their work upon the tariff:

FALL RIVER, MASS., April 1.

It is not expected that the King Phillip mills will resume to-morrow, as notice was given Saturday to a portion of the help that for an indefinite period their services would not again be required. The position of the King Phillip Mills Company is different from that of any other of the forty corporations here. There are but three or four mills in the country making as fine grade of products, and it is one of the few mills in this section whose goods are made to compete with those of foreign countries in the New York market. The discriminations against fine fabrics in the Wilson bill caused a continuation of the dull, uncertain market for its products. It went on manufacturing them, however, storing them in its warehouse until, it is said, to now have at least three-quarters of a million dollars' worth on hand. Its managers began alternately shutting down its different mills, until its two best mills were wholly closed for an indefinite period.

Thinking that the operatives might consent to work for smaller wages until the times grew better, Agent Chase called a delegation of them together and went over the situation, concluding by saying that he had confidence enough in the future to continue manufacturing for storage, provided he could do so at less cost. He understood that a majority of the operatives consulted were willing to work under a reduced scale for a little while; but when they went to their union for permission to do so that body gave orders for them to stop work rather than submit to a reduction.

That was some weeks ago, and before a reduction was generally feared in the rest of the mills. Since then the Spinners and Weavers' Union have been paying out large sums in support of idle members. Last week Agent Chase again renewed this proposition to reduce wages. To-morrow night the spinners' executive committee expects to act on this proposition. The stopping of the rest of the mill came as a general surprise to the help.

CANADIAN RELATIONS.

I come now, Mr. President, to the consideration of that portion of the bill which more nearly affects my own constituency, and which falls with destructive force upon the farmers and manufacturers and laborers of that entire portion of the United States which stretches across the continent from Maine to Oregon and Washington, and which finds sharp competition and a dangerous rival in the Dominion of Canada, which lies along its entire border.

I do not hesitate to charge that, as affecting this region of our own country, this bill is made up after a fashion that could not have better satisfied the Canadians had a committee of their own taken the subject in charge and fixed their own schedules and duties. I am not unaware that in making this statement I am assuming a grave responsibility, and I certainly should not make it if I did not believe that a study of the bill bears me out in this strong assertion.

Before taking up the different paragraphs of this portion of the bill I wish, first, to say a word upon its calamitous effect upon our general relations, present and prospective, with the Dominion of Canada. No man can acquaint himself with the conditions of life found upon the two sides of the line which separates us from Canada without becoming convinced that at no distant day that line must disappear and the two countries be made one. The United States will absorb Canada. Seventy millions of people will not go to five millions, but the five millions will come to the seventy millions. In the near future I should desire to see the consummation of this union. I think this is the general feeling of intelligent and patriotic men in the United States, and I am entirely confident that this feeling is growing with the business men and the industrial classes of our northern neighbor.

I incline to the belief that the middle-aged men of this body whom I now see before me will witness the extension of this Republic northward to that impenetrable ice-barrier into which no life nor industry can make its way. But this union ought to and will result from natural causes and by peaceful processes. There will be no war. There will be no invasion of Canada. There will be no strife and no battlefield where the Anglo-Saxon will meet his brother of the same blood. It will be annexation desired by Canada, based upon the sentiment of all her people, the place-holding class being the last to give way; and this sentiment will be founded upon the spectacle of a greater prosperity upon this side of the border which the Canadian people will desire to share and enjoy. They will desire to enjoy all the privileges which are secured to each State in this Union in its dealings with the others, and will not be content till every barrier which prevents the two nations from being one shall be removed.

Such a union will be beneficial to both. The entire market of the United States will be thrown open to Canada, and her undeveloped resources, commercial, mineral, and agricultural, will open an immense field to our enterprise, our capital, our skill, and our labor. Nothing but political union can give this equal benefit to both sides. No tariff bill can do this, for while you may, as in the present bill, open the market of the United States to Canada and give to the 5,000,000 of people the market of the 70,000,000, you can not and do not attempt to give to the United States the great benefit which would come to us from annexation in the opening of Canada's great domain to our own enterprise and capital.

So it has heretofore been the work of statesmanship in dealing with this question to give no present advantage to Canada's interests, but to apply the protective system to all Canadian products by such a scale of duties as would stimulate the industries of our own border and shut out those of Canada, thereby bringing day by day with added force to the minds of the Canadians the consideration that only by political union, and the advantages which the United States would derive from it, could Canada be given the open markets of our own great people.

So it has come about that reciprocity treaties which have been negotiated with Canada, and which had at their bottom what has been called commercial union, have proved failures and have been abrogated or allowed to die by expiration of law.

The provisions of the McKinley bill were based upon this theory, and whoever has been in the Dominion in the last three years must have seen the effect of these provisions upon public sentiment there. The McKinley bill added to our own industries upon this side of the line, and under it the importations from Canada materially diminished, thus bringing before the Canadian farmer and manufacturer and laborer the inevitable proposition that to annexation alone they must look for relief.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator from Maine object to an interruption?

Mr. HALE. I do not.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator what would become of that beneficent result if we had the political union which he thinks is so desirable?

Mr. HALE. I have stated (I am sorry the Senator from Delaware did not listen to me) that political union gives to the United States the benefit of that great domain in Canada found in her commercial, her agriculture, her mineral resources, all of which by annexation would be open to our capital and our enterprise, and would therefore be an offset against the markets that we should give to them; but that no tariff bill can give them, and it does not attempt to give them.

Mr. GRAY. But still, political union would open our markets, as the Senator and his school of political economists call them, to the agricultural products of Canada, without stint, let, or hindrance of any kind at all.

Mr. HALE. Which we could very well afford to do with annexation, but which we can never afford to do under a tariff bill, and which we will never get under such a tariff bill as the Wilson bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. In answering the suggestion made by the Senator from Delaware, I will say that this bill practically and substantially opens up the markets of the United States to the agriculturists of Canada and to all the producers of Canada, without any compensation to the people of the United States, without any reciprocity whatever, and with no conditions asked or expected evidently by the framers of this bill. They have, in other words, given to Canada, without any offset or any compensation, all that the people of Canada have asked for at any time within the last ten years.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Maine for a single inquiry.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island what possible reciprocal benefit would come to the farmers along the border, in the case of political union, if these unstinted imports—which the Senator from Maine says in that case would be a blessing—of barley, wheat, flour, and lumber come into the United States, to be consumed here by those who need them?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Canadian market would be open to American producers and the customers of the American agriculturists, and the only profitable customers they have are the American producers. The markets of the United States would be enlarged indefinitely by such a policy.

Mr. GRAY. My question was, What benefit would come to the farmers along the Canadian border?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I answered that.

Mr. FRYE. There would not be any border then; it would be our country.

Mr. GRAY. Exactly. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Delaware persists in ignoring what I stated in the beginning of this subject, that the benefit to us in giving to Canada our great market would be that they would become a part of the Union; that all their resources would be open to us; that all our industry, all our enterprise, all our capital would penetrate Canada; the border would disappear, as my colleague has said, and that would be an offsetting advantage, which we could not gain, I repeat, under any tariff bill. Take, for instance, the annexation of that great territory which came to us from treaties following the Mexican war. Has anybody any doubt that the advantages we derived were commensurate with any advantage that small population got from our markets. It gave us a new outlet for our enterprise, for immigration; it enlarged the borders of the Republic, and made us grander and nobler. So when we go in our northward progress toward the ice barrier and make Canada by peaceful process a part of this country, then the border disappears and other considerations besides the advantages of trade come in. That can not be done, I repeat, without political union, as Senators will see. It can not be accomplished by a mere tariff.

Mr. GRAY. I quite agree with the Senator about the desirability of enlarging the area of free trade in this country, and extending it not only from the Gulf to the Lakes and from ocean to ocean, but extending it as far as civilization and human life can exist to the northward, and, as the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] said, abolish the border. My question was, however, what specific compensating benefit would come to the farmer, whose products enter into competition with the agricultural products that would come over what was before the border? He must contemplate this glorious prospect of an enlarged country and an enlarged area over which free trade would range, and resort to his patriotic impulses and feelings in order to get any benefit whatever; but no specific benefit would come to the farmer himself, so far as I can see from the argument of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. The Senator believes in the general benefit of free trade the world over. He believes in extending free trade, not by the annexation of other countries and making them part of ours, but by tariff legislation which gives up our markets and gets nothing for them.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Maine allow me a moment?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. MORRILL. I want to say that in case of annexation the large amount of immigration that now goes to Canada would stay there and consume all of their agricultural products, and there would be none to come across the border.

Mr. HALE. I give a table here showing the difference in Canadian importations the first year of the McKinley bill and the year before its enactment, showing a decrease of imports from Canada in thirteen different articles of more than six millions of dollars, all of which was made up by increased supply in the United States:

Exports to the United States from Canada in the two years 1890 and 1892.

Articles.	1890.	1892.	Decrease.
Horses	$1,887,895	$1,094,461	$793,434
Horned cattle	104,623	21,327	83,296
Poultry	105,612	44,537	61,075
Eggs	1,793,104	494,409	1,298,695
Wool	235,436	200,125	35,311
Flax	175,563	112,300	63,203
Apples	149,479	27,661	121,818
Barley	4,582,561	1,354,485	3,228,076
Split pease	74,215	20,460	53,755
Hay	922,797	598,567	324,230
Malt	149,310	20	149,290
Potatoes	303,915	41,886	267,029
Vegetables	80,976	68,948	12,028
Totals	10,570,486	4,3079,246	6,491,240

The Wilson bill and the amendments reported by the Senate committee throw over all this advantage and indefinitely postpone political union of the two countries, and in fact establish a policy so favorable to the Canadian that I should look to see the growing sentiment for annexation die out, and that in the generation to come we should find ourselves with a growing and possibly hostile rival along our entire Northern border. This consideration alone, in the broad domain of statesmanship, ought to be in itself the deathblow of the bill.

I propose now, Mr. President, somewhat in detail, to show where and to what extent the offensive provisions of this bill to which I have alluded in this branch of the subject are found. I give here a table of different articles, showing the duty under the McKinley bill, under the House bill, and under the bill as submitted to the Senate by its committee, to be printed at the close of my remarks.

The difference between the House bill, as passed by that body, and the bill reported by the Senate committee, will be found in each case, where the changes made by the Senate committee are inserted in italics, the corresponding provisions of the House bill being stricken out. Each paragraph shows by itself the changes made by the Senate committee.

In approaching the details of this part of the bill certain general considerations bearing upon the competition of Canadian labor and products with ours should be kept in mind. When our labor is put into this competition with Canadian labor it has not the advantage, in the way of transportation, which it is claimed applies to other countries.

The geographical conditions of the Dominion of Canada, her great water ways furnishing cheap transit to the seacoast, the long line of that coast which includes the maritime provinces, fully balance any advantage which the industries of the border belt of the United States might have in gaining the great markets of this country.

The New Brunswick and Nova Scotia shipper, with his home-built vessel, can compete with the Maine vessel in reaching the Boston, Providence, New York, or Philadelphia market, and, indeed, can give odds in freight. And, in the same line, the system of Canadian railways has been made so complete, by the liberal investment of British capital and the subsidizing aid of the British Government, that the same advantages which apply to the shipper by the sea are enjoyed by the shipper from the interior, over the lines of Canadian railways.

But beyond all this the conditions of life throughout Canada, the different manner of living, the different scale of advantage enjoyed, result in different rates of labor paid upon the two sides of the border, varying from 25 to 40 per cent. Nowhere, perhaps, in the world, is the consideration of cheaper labor entering into manufactured products so clearly presented to the eye as in the comparison of wages between the United States and Canada.

In some parts of the Dominion the wages paid in corresponding branches of labor, will not vary much from one-half of those paid on this side.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to make some further comment upon some or all of these articles. They embrace, to begin with, almost the totality of the industries of my own State and, in set form, they pitilessly legislate against all the interests of the State of Maine and in favor of her Canadian rival. I do not think that such an instance of oppression of the industries of a State by legislative enactment, can be found in any tariff bill that has ever been adopted in the United States.

The House and the Senate committee have hewn to the line, and nothing is left. Lumber, in all its divers forms, pulp, granite, fish, starch, potatoes, lime, horses, sheep and horned cattle, wool, buckwheat and oats, hay, butter and cheese, and eggs; these, Mr. President, when to them are added woolen, cotton, and plush manufactures, cover almost all the occupations of the people whom my colleague and I represent upon this floor.

In some of these items the oppression of the bill is very marked, and considering that both in the House and before the committee of the Senate, all the facts were presented, it is difficult to see how the conclusions arrived at in the bill, in either branch, have been reached.

LUMBER.

I take first, as being the greatest subject, the memorial of the Maine lumbermen touching the lumber business of the country which, nearly two months ago, I introduced in the Senate, and which was referred to the Finance Committee, and which was afterwards laid before each member of that committee individually. To this is added a collection of practical statistics upon the subject prepared by Mr. George A. Priest, in charge of forest industries in the last United States census. I read from both of these, and they will be printed at the end of my remarks.

Beyond the fierce thrust which this bill makes at the lumber interest in Maine, so well brought out in the memorial which I have just read, it will be seen from these statements and figures that this industry is one of the greatest, perhaps the greatest, in the United States, it being found in more than half of the States of the Union, having in the last forty years extended itself from the forests of Maine to the States of the middle Northwest, thence to the Pacific, and of late years has advanced steadily through that belt of the Southern States, including Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama, North Carolina, West Virginia, Virginia, and Georgia.

In seven Southern States more than $80,000,000 have been invested in this enterprise, and from nearly every one of those States protests have come up against the hostile action of the House and the Senate committee.

The Treasury receives annually from duties on imported lumber something more than $1,100,000. The House and the Senate committee propose to give this up entirely and have placed lumber, with the exception of the small item of planed lumber, on the free list.

The growth of this industry in the South is gratifying and significant, and the lumberman of Arkansas and Tennessee and Alabama and West Virginia is reaching out for the market of St. Louis and Cincinnati, and lumbermen of West Virginia and Virginia and North Carolina are already driving Maine out of the markets of Norfork, Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia; and, under the provisions of this bill, the New Brunswick lumbermen can in turn drive these out of the markets of those great cities. I can not believe, Mr. President, that when we approach this feature of the bill, the Senate will deliberately sustain the action of the committee in relation to this great industry.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the Senator asking a question.

Mr. McPHERSON. I failed to distinctly understand the last remark made by the Senator from Maine. I understood him to say, in speaking of the vast number of articles imported from Canada, that they were placed upon the free list, and I understood him to refer to agricultural products; perhaps he may have been speaking of lumber instead, because the Senate bill does not place those articles upon the free list, but gives a fair measure of duty upon all Canadian products coming to the United States.

Mr. HALE. I have not reached the agricultural feature yet.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understood the Senator to refer to it.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine to reflect on the very true statement which he has just made of the effect of the Wilson tariff bill so called upon lumber, and contrast it with what he said a little while ago about the sectional character of this bill as coming from a committee of Southern Senators.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the treatment which the relatively small lumber interest in the South receives in this bill only emphasises my proposition—that Southern lumber interest is not large enough to save it from the blow which is aimed at a great Northern interest. I do not suppose if things had been reversed, and the Southern product had been $500,000,000 against $80,000,000 in the North, that lumber would have been put upon the free list; but where it is only a fraction of the entire trade, and there is nobody to represent it, then lumber is put upon the free list, and the few interests in the South suffer with those of the North.

Mr. VILAS. I simply wish to add, if the Senator from Maine will permit me, that no section of the country has complained more or louder in respect to the subject of lumber, or pressed harder upon their representatives, than the lumber interests of the South in addressing the Senators who represent the Southern States, and they have yielded in the interests which have been pressed upon them in that manner to their sense of the common good of the entire country.

LIME.

Mr. HALE. The production of lime in this country, an important part of the industry of Maine, but by no means confined to that State, affords a singular example of the necessity for a protective duty in order to maintain the industry in this country.

Within the last few years lime quarries have been bought and opened in New Brunswick and in the Province of Quebec, largely by citizens of the United States, who have made these ventures in order to get the benefit of the low rate of wages paid in Canada as compared with our rates. It was found in 1890 that so great was the advantage which these low wages gave to the Canadian manufacturer of lime that he could soon close every quarry and lime kiln upon this side and drive the manufacturer out of business. To prevent this the rate was fixed by the McKinley bill at 6 cents per hundred pounds of lime, including the barrel or covering, which would be at the rate of about 13 cents a barrel.

The House bill cut this down to 10 per centum ad valorem, not including the barrel or covering, which would be equal to about 3 cents per barrel. This provision has been somewhat improved by the Senate committee, which has fixed the duty at 15 per cent, including the barrel or covering, or an equivalent of about 6 cents per barrel—less than half the duty in the McKinley bill.

I do not think, Mr. President, that under the bill of either the House of Representatives or the Senate committee the lime manufacturers of Maine, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia can keep in business two years longer.

The case is well stated in the memorials and in the circular answers which were laid before the committee, and which I read, and will have printed at the close of my remarks. Senators will see that in this matter Maine and Virginia speak in the same voice.

Mr. GRAY. What was the duty before?

Mr. HALE. Thirteen cents.

Mr. GRAY. Per barrel?

Mr. HALE. Per barrel, including the covering.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I have occupied so much time that I fear I shall never get through if I yield to further interruptions.

Mr. GRAY. I wanted to know if the Senator knew about how many people were dependent on that industry in his own State?

Mr. HALE. I can not tell exactly how many, but thousands of our people are dependent upon it.

Mr. GRAY. I want to remind the Senator that there is not a farm on the Atlantic seaboard which can be profitably cultivated without purchasing lime each year.

Mr. HALE. I have said the price of lime was not advanced one cent by the duty in the McKinley act.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator a question at this point?

Mr. HALE. I think I shall follow the precedent which has been set thus far in the discussion and go on without further interruptions.

Mr. McPHERSON. This is an important matter, and we ought to settle it as we go along.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Senator from Maine declines to be interrupted.

Mr. HALE. I will yield to the Senator, as the Senator is always very good himself in yielding.

Mr. McPHERSON. I only wanted to inquire if there is a State in the American Union which does not produce as much lime as is needed for the purposes of its people? When, as I believe is the case, the whole labor cost of the burning of a barrel of lime in the State of Maine does not exceed 6 cents a bushel, and when you add to that the freight from Canada and the other expenses in the shape of natural protection, I can not imagine how 15 per cent duty will not cover the whole.

Mr. HALE. The Senator's question contains so much information that is wrong upon subjects that he knows nothing about, that I can not answer him.

I think I know something more about the cost of the production of lime and the effect of it upon my own constituents than does the Senator from New Jersey, and I am not depending upon my own statement alone; but I should like to ask the Senator, if he has time from his many duties and in the burden that I know is now oppressing him of sharing in the responsibility of the make-up of this bill (which I think he is careful to say he had very little to do with), to read these memorials which are presented, but I will not press him to do so.

Mr. McPHERSON. I care nothing about the memorials and the statement of the question as the Senator from Maine seems to be stating it now, because to my mind they are hardly worthy of consideration upon a subject of this kind.

POTATOES AND STARCH.

Mr. HALE. The potato industry of Maine and the starch industry, the latter product being made from the potato, are so closely associated that I will deal with them together, and the papers which I put in will bear upon starch and potatoes.

By the McKinley bill the duty on potatoes was made 25 cents per bushel and upon starch 2 cents per pound, and upon dextrine, or burnt starch, gum substitute, or British gum, 1½ cents per pound.

The House bill cut down potatoes to 10 cents per bushel, and starch and dextrine to 1 cent per pound, and the Senate committee has further reduced the duty on potatoes to 30 per cent ad valorem, which would be about 6 cents per bushel instead of 25, according to the present law, and has left starch and dextrine at 30 per cent ad valorem.

These reductions, so far as Maine goes, mean the entire destruction of the starch industry, and render it impossible for the Maine farmer to compete with his New Brunswick rival in raising potatoes for the large markets of the country.

I hold in my hand the appealing protest of eleven hundred men in Aroostook County, who, without regard to politics, have signed their names to this protest against action which, as they say, will drive an important industry from our side of the line into Canada.

The heading of the petition is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the county of Aroostook, in the State of Maine, respectfully represent that said county is the largest in area and is capable of the greatest agricultural development of any in New England; that potatoes are the chief agricultural product of said county; that the manufacture of starch from said potatoes is one of the most important industries of the State of Maine, and is principally carried on in said county; that upon the raising of potatoes and the manufacture of starch the agricultural welfare of said county depends; that since said industries have been protected by an adequate tariff said county has increased in population and wealth more rapidly than any other agricultural district in New England; that said county extends along the border of the Dominion of Canada for nearly 300 miles, and that if the so-called Wilson bill becomes a law the starch manufacturers of Aroostook will be thrown into direct competition with the richest agricultural districts of the lower provinces; that the cheapness of labor in, and the superior natural advantages as regards the transportation of merchandise of, that portion of Canada lying along our borders, together with the fertility of its soil, will place the starch manufacturers of Aroostook at such a disadvantage as to render such competition hopeless, and the important industry upon which our agricultural prosperity depends will pass from Aroostook to be carried on for the benefit of the farmers of New Brunswick on Canadian soil. We therefore pray that your honorable body will continue upon the manufacture of starch such a measure of protection as the welfare of our industries and the prosperity of our county require.

It is not often, Mr. President, that a petition so significant as this, which I have borrowed from the files of the Finance Committee of the Senate, to whom it was referred, is brought before Congress. It is not a petition manufactured or gotten up to order. The surprise and anxiety and dismay which pervade that part of my State take voice in this petition. The men who signed it, whose names as I unroll it here appear, have fixed their signatures with a full sense of the gravity of the situation as it affected their everyday life and prosperity, and the welfare of their wives and children. They are the farmers and the laborers who are found in so many of the towns of that hitherto flourishing county of Aroostook, which, by the bill now before the Senate, are threatened with a deathblow.

Should this bill pass, Mr. President, I should not like to take upon myself the task of addressing the people of Aroostook County, in the coming political campaign, in the interests of the Democratic party and in the advocacy of its candidates before that people.

I read here two letters, one to my colleague and the other to myself, from parties thoroughly informed as to these industries, and I call special attention to the clear summing up of conclusions as to the disastrous effect of this bill as given in Mr. Phair's letter:

OFFICE OF T. H. PHAIR,
MANUFACTURER OF POTATO STARCH AND LUMBER,
Presque Isle, Me., March 19, 1894.

DEAR SIR: I see the Senate committee have changed the duty on starch from the House bill of 1 cent per pound. to 30 per cent ad valorem. Foreign starch is in the market at $1.85 per hundred pounds: that would make the price delivered in this country less than 2¼ cents per pound.

It takes 225 bushels potatoes to make 1 ton starch. and 1 cent per pound to manufacture and deliver in Boston, so you see we should have to buy potatoes for 10 cents per bushel or less, if the bill passes as it is now.

There would not be a pound of potato starch made in this country.

The potato-grower must raise only what he can safely raise and cellar.

There are over fifty mills in this county and they would not be worth a cent apiece.

This bill simply ruins the industry of raising potatoes and manufacturing starch, and after we are out of the business and our mills have rotted down, the consumer will pay more for his starch than he does now.

Yours, truly,

T. H. PHAIR.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON, March 9, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 8th received and contents carefully noted. We fully agree with you in your remarks in relation the Wilson bill.

In regard to your inquiry will say that it takes 12 bushels of potatoes, on an average, to make 100 pounds of starch—12 bushels of potatoes at 20 cents, $2.40; cost of manufacturing 30 cents, commission and freight 40 cents, package 15 cents, making in all $3.25 net cost, say nothing about wear and tear and interest on the plant. The vats in the factories rot out every five years and have to be rebuilt new.

In the above estimate we have been very conservative, and put down everything at the lowest possible cost. The farmers say that they can not raise potatoes at under 25 cents, but we have put them down to 20 cents. We suppose that every gentleman on the Finance Committee knows enough about farming to know that potatoes can not be raised in this country at under 20 cents per bushel.

The McKinley bill did not raise the duty on potato starch. Before 1883 the duty was 1 cent per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem. In the revision of that year it was put up to 2 cents per pound. The price of starch under the present duty depends on the crop of potatoes. There is always competition enough to keep it down to a reasonable price. Last year the price ran from 4½ to 4¾. This year business has been so very dull and the demand so light that the price has been 3½ to 3¾.

We wrote you the other day that we could import the German starch at $1.85 per 100 pounds to-day, and if the Finance Committee bill should pass we could import that starch, duty paid, at $2.40 per 100 pounds.

There is one thing that we wish the committee to understand, and that is there is a great difference between potato starches and any of the other starches made in this country. We do not need much of any duty on corn and wheat starches, as this is the greatest corn and wheat growing country in the world, and we can and do export both corn and wheat starch.

A few years ago about all the glucose made in the world was made from potato starch in Germany, and we used to import all our glucose from that country; but now our country can beat the world in the article from corn. This is the reason why German potato starch is so low and why potato starch should be protected.

The potato-starch people are willing to take their share of the cut, and could probably go on under a duty of 1½ to 1¾ cents per pound, but the proposed cut of 30 per cent ad valorem, as we have said, would close every factory in the United States. There are about 130 potato-starch factories in this country, 45 in Maine, 15 or 20 in New Hampshire, about 50 in New York, 10 in Minnesota, 4 or 5 in Wisconsin, and 1 or 2 in North Dakota.

About the whole cost of this starch is made up of labor. We believe if your committee fully understand the situation that they will be glad and willing to right this wrong.

We do not own one single dollar of stock in any potato-starch factory; we only handle their starch, but we are fully posted on the business, and we give you the true facts. We have been in the business for the past thirty years.

Very truly, yours,

EUSTIS & ALDRICH.

Hon. WM. P. FRYE, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Maine in this connection. In the State which I have the honor to represent in part in this Chamber, during the existence of the present McKinley act, potatoes of the very finest character by the thousands of bushels have rotted in the ground and were not dug simply because they were not worth being sent to market.

Mr. WASHBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska how recently that condition of things has existed in his State?

Mr. ALLEN. It has existed since 1890; that is, not each year.

Mr. WASHBURN. If the Senator from Maine will pardon me——

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN. I will state that in the neighboring State of Minnesota potatoes have not been worth less than 50 or 60 cents a bushel since the passage of the McKinley act, and that the farmers of our State have become largely enriched by the production of potatoes.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator's State is not a good one for this product.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senators will settle this controversy about their States afterwards, for I am taking up more of the time of the Senate than I intended to do.

GRANITE.

An important product of Maine, found sometimes in the interior of the State, but more largely along its coast, is found in the divers manufactures of granite, and, as will be readily seen, almost every form in which this manufacture is used is made up in its cost almost entirely of labor. The slender shaft or the sarcophagus in the cemetery, the ornamentations and surroundings of private estates, the stately buildings which are reared in so many of our towns and cities, all find their value in the hand of labor which has wrought upon the original material embedded in the quarries.

It is a matter of some pride to our people in Maine that great public buildings in Philadelphia, and as far in the interior as Cincinnati and St. Louis, have been constructed, upon advertisement and bidding in which the whole country competed, from Maine granite; but this could only be done by the best business management, by the employment of the best and most skilled labor, and under conditions where a moderate duty discriminated in a small degree against the granite of Canada and, indeed, of Scotland. I have been told that the Aberdeen granite, with no duty upon it, can be shipped in ballast and drive out of the market the red granite from the quarries of Maine; and certainly the Canadian granite can do this under like conditions.

The House bill upon this article, and the Senate committee has adopted the House provisions, instead of a duty of 11 cents per ton upon rough stone, including granite and other stone, has put it upon the free list; and upon hewn and dressed granite has cut down the duty from 40 per cent ad valorem to 20 per cent ad valorem.

I never have been able to discover any reason for this reduction and this blow at this important branch of labor in Maine, but I am sure that the stonecutters and quarrymen of my own State will entirely appreciate the act and will suffer from its results.

In the same line of reduction slate and roofing slate have been cut down as shown by the schedule from 30 and 25 per cent to 20 per cent in each case.

FISH.

The interests of the hardy fishermen of the Maine and Massachusetts coast were, from an early day, the subject of the fostering care of the Government, and, for many years under Democratic and Whig administrations, a considerable bounty was paid directly from the Treasury and divided among the owners of fishing vessels and the crews, to encourage and stimulate them in their dangerous vocations, and since this bounty was taken off the competition between the fishermen of those States and those of the maritime provinces of Canada has been recognized in reasonable duties imposed in different tariff bills.

The schedules which I have submitted show, in almost every class of this product, a reduction of the specific duty provided for by the McKinley bill, an ad valorem rate ranging from 40 to 60 per cent reduction, and in the large industry of the packing of sardines and other fish in oil and in tin boxes, where the McKinley bill provided specific duties according to the size of the boxes sufficient to protect our own establishments, the House bill has substituted for this a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem, and the Senate committee, not content with this, has further reduced it to 25 per cent, which is only equivalent to about one-third of the former duty.

Mr. GRAY. What was the duty before—40 per cent?

Mr. HALE. It ranged from 40 to 60 per cent; and upon packed fish, which is a great industry, there was a specific duty according to the size of the box. For that there has been substituted an ad valorem duty, which only amounts to about one-third of the former duty. Why it is that this most meritorious industry—an industry involving labor, danger, risk, everything that appeals not only to sympathy, but to ordinary good sense, it would seem, in legislating upon tariff bills—has been selected, we have not been able to find out.

I read here a statement as to the effect of the bill upon this industry:

The magnitude of the domestic sardine industry is not generally known. There are 58 factories, large and small. There are about 8,700 people employed. The annual product amounts to about $2,600,000, and is made up as follows:

120,000 boxes tin plate, at $5	$600,000
24,000 pounds solder, at 12½ cents	300,000
700,000 gallons of oil, at 40 cents	280,000
300,000 gallons of mustard, at 20 cents	60,000
300,000 barrels fish, at $1.25	375,000
800,000 packing boxes, at 10 cents	80,000
Decorating 40,000 cases of tin plate, at $2	80,000
	1,775,000

The present duty is satisfactory to all. No reduction has been asked by anybody. The tariff of 1883 proved so satisfactory that no attempt has heretofore been made to change it, not even the Mills bill, which left it as fixed in 1883. The Wilson bill proposes to reduce from $2.50 per case quarter-oil sardines to 30 per cent ad valorem.

The domestic sardine packed on the coast of Maine, that sells for $3.50 to $4, are not in competition with what is commercially known as foreign sardines; but there is an article packed in Spain and Algiers that is now invoiced in Marseilles at 19 francs in small lots. If the Wilson bill is passed, they would find their way to this market in large quantities, and invoiced at 15 francs or less, with duty, freight, insurance, and interest added, they would be laid down in New York at about $4. This is the article with which we can not compete at any decent remunerative rate for labor, unless we could reduce the cost of the manufactured article. You will observe that of the cost of the manufactured article, $825,000 is for labor. The materials entering into the manufacture are figured close. If any reduction in our cost is to be made, it must be in the labor. This is substantially our case.

I also, as in the case of the farmers and starch manufacturers of Aroostook County, present the petition signed by 800 citizens of Washington and Hancock Counties, remonstrating against the reduction of duties on foreign sardines, and call attention to the fact that without distinction of party the signers represent the interests of this industry, established upon the coast of the two counties of Washington and Hancock, in the State of Maine, and as in the case of the Aroostook petition, these signers lift their voice in protest against the provisions of this bill which interfere with their labor and with the comforts of their everyday life.

There are some very strange and curious features in this bill, and one is found in the treatment which the Senate committee has given to the manufactures of high explosives and gunpowder. The McKinley bill placed a duty of 5 cents per pound on gunpowder and explosives valued at 20 cents or less per pound, and 8 cents per pound on all gunpowder and explosives valued at above 20 cents per pound.

In attacking this manufacture the House of Representatives, recognizing the importance of this manufacture, left the duty as it was fixed by the McKinley bill; but the Senate committee, for some unaccountable reason, has determined to destroy this manufacture and has cut the duty on all gunpowder and explosive substances, used for mining, blasting, artillery, or sporting purposes, to 10 per cent ad valorem.

My attention has been specially called to this because in the western part of Maine, upon one of our most accessible rivers, there has been established for years a gunpowder manufactory, in which a large capital has been invested for land and buildings and machinery. The work is hazardous and there have been several explosions; but, notwithstanding this, the manufacture has been kept up, and has given employment to many mechanics and laborers.

I have here a protest against the action of the Senate committee on this article, which I will read, as it states clearly the whole case, and calls attention to the important consideration that our Government, having no powder manufactories of its own, must depend upon the establishments in this country, and that nothing could be more unpatriotic than to discourage and drive out of business these establishments. The protest is signed by the Du Ponts and Hazard Powder Companies, the Atlantic Dynamite Company, the Hecla Powder Company, and others, covering most of the manufactories in this country, who are, even under present duties, the subject of close competition on the part of the powder makers of England, France, Germany, and Canada.

POWDER.

To the Committee of Finance, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIRS: The undersigned, manufacturers of gunpowder and high explosives in the United States, find that the proposed reduction of duties on gunpowder and explosives from 5 cents per pound on gunpowder and explosives valued at 20 cents and under, and 8 cents per pound on all gunpowder and explosives valued at over 20 cents per pound to 10 per cent ad valorem, will seriously injure their business, and respectfully submit the following reasons, among many, why the duty as proposed in the Wilson bill should not be disturbed:

First. Wages in this country paid to employés engaged in the manufacture of gunpowder and high explosives are twice as great as received for like employment in England, and amount to fully 50 per cent on the cost of manufacturing gunpowder and explosives; consequently a 10 per cent ad valorem duty will be no protection to the manufacturers in the United States, and if an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent is placed on gunpowder and explosives it will require wages to be greatly reduced.

Second. There are no Government powder mills in the United States, consequently the Government must rely on private manufacturers, and if by reason of foreign competition they are compelled to abandon the business, the Government would find itself unable to meet requirements for explosives in time of war.

Third. Gunpowder manufacturers in Canada will be enabled to send their powder into this country if the duty is reduced to 10 per cent ad valorem; and unless the tariff on gunpowder be reduced by the Canadian Government to the same amount as now proposed in the Senate, the manufacturers of the United States can not retaliate by sending their goods into Canada.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] suggests to me that a relief for the Government, should we ever find ourselves in conflict with any other power, would be to put into effect the free-trade theory and ask the hostile power to suspend hostilities until we might learn in what market of the world we could buy gunpowder the cheapest. I do not see any other process that we could resort to.

Mr. LINDSAY. Will the Senator from Maine pardon me?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I am always glad to hear the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LINDSAY. I understand the position of the Senator to be that gunpowder may be legitimately protected because the Government is interested in it.

Mr. HALE. I give that as one reason.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that during the civil war when there was not a powder factory in the South at the commencement of the war, enough powder was improvised to protract a four-years' war, and if he heard any complaint in the South for want of powder?

Mr. HALE. I was not there, but I have heard from our people, who in some way or other did succeed in getting down South, that there was great complaint; and I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that as great a task as we found in putting an end to the rebellion and restoring the Union, if there had been gunpowder manufactories sustained throughout the South by a good protective system it would have made our task of conquering the South infinitely harder than we found it. I never want to see the country put into the condition that the Senator has suggested, where in the time of war we would have to resort to the process of slow manufacture and small establishments in order to defend the country; and I do not think the Senator himself desires that; I know that he does not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to remind the Senator from Maine, if I do not interrupt him, that gunpowder came over there very freely from England. Nearly all that was used by the Southern States was made in England and shipped over.

Mr. HALE. There was undoubtedly free trade then between the South and Europe in gunpowder.

Mr. LINDSAY. My recollection is that the free trade was very much interfered with by blockades at all the ports of the South.

Mr. HALE. But it was not cut off.

Mr. LINDSAY. It was only in rare instances that a blockade runner could get in. It was nearly as much benefit to the South as the tariff now to the North.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to inquire whether the Senator considered it an industrial advantage to the South that it actually had no powder manufactories?

Mr. LINDSAY. No; but it did prove that it is not necessary to protect powder mills in time of peace in order to have ample powder in time of war.

Mr. HALE. In other words, the Senator says that the South managed to get along without it. If all that can be said for free trade is that a people under it can manage to "get along," can live, as the Southern Confederacy did, can struggle and struggle gallantly, but in the end go to the wall, if that is all that can be said in favor of free trade, it is not a very convincing argument.

Other items in which we are interested in Maine show for themselves in the schedule which I have submitted, contrasting the McKinley bill with the legislation which is here urged upon us, and in each instance the hostility to Maine's interest is manifest, as in the cases which I have specifically noted.

As showing the encouragement which is given by this bill to the introduction of Canadian agricultural products which compete with like products of the United States farmer in the entire belt of Northern States, I give the following figures:

Entire exports of Canadian produce in 1892, $113,963,375, which is largely made up of the following items, which come in direct competition with our own products and our own labor:

Lumber and other forest products	$5,288,087	Other agricultural products	$10,767,657
Cheese	11,652,412	Codfish	3,180,726
Horned cattle	7,748,949	Fish of other kinds	6,494,672
Horses	1,364,027	Coal	3,195,487
Sheep	1,385,146	Wood, and manufactures of wood	18,080,080
Eggs	1,089,798
Other animal products	5,364,580
Wheat and wheat flour	8,732,264
Barley	2,613,363	Total	$86,957,166

Four-fifths of these products, the result of cheap labor, and, with the transportation as I have heretofore explained at least on an equality with ours, come in direct competition with the farmer of the United States. While the House of Representatives and the Senate committee have, in almost every instance, struck down the duties upon all these products, thereby making our markets the dumping ground for the Canadian, it is interesting to know that, in the adjustment of the Canadian tariff which is proposed by the present ministry of the Dominion, the rates upon corresponding articles, as shown by the amendment which Mr. Foster, the Canadian minister of finance, has submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means in the Dominion Parliament, as the programme which will undoubtedly be carried out, show the following as against the rates in the Wilson bill as amended:

Articles.	Canadian.	Senate bill.
Live animals	20 per cent ad valorem	20 per cent ad valorem.
Beef, salted, in barrels	2 cents per pound	Free.
Live hogs	25 per cent	20 per cent.
Meats, fresh	3 cents per pound
Bacon and ham		Free.
Mutton and lamb, fresh	35 per cent
Beef, mutton, and pork		25 per cent.
Poultry	20 per cent	20 per cent.
Butter	4 cents per pound	Do.
Cheese	3 cents per pound	25 per cent.
Apples	40 cents per barrel, including barrel.	20 per cent.
Beans	15 cents per bushel	Do.
Buckwheat	10 cents per bushel	Do.
Pease	10 cents per bushel	Free.
Potatoes	15 cents per bushel	30 per cent.
Rye	10 cents per bushel	20 per cent.
Rye flour	50 cents per barrel	Do.
Hay	$2 per ton	Do.
Vegetables	25 per cent	10 per cent.
Corn meal	40 cents per barrel	20 per cent.
Oats	10 cents per bushel	Do.
Rice	1 cent per pound	1½ cents per pound.
Wheat	15 cents per bushel	20 per cent.
Wheat flour	75 cents per barrel	Do.
Starch, including all preparations of starch.	1½ cents per pound, including weight of package.	30 per cent.
Hops	6 cents per pound	20 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. Those are specific duties?

Mr. FRYE. All their duties are specific.

Mr. HALE. As further good reading to the authors of the Wilson bill and the majority members of the Senate Finance Committee, I read the following extract from a New Brunswick newspaper:

[From the St. John Telegraph.]

The people of New Brunswick, and especially of St. John, will be profoundly affected by the tariff changes in the new bill. The lime industry, for instance, may be cited as an example of a business which may be expected to increase enormously under the changed tariff conditions. There are about forty kilns in the vicinity of St. John, and of these all but five or six were closed in consequence of the high tariff imposed by the McKinley act. Now, with a return to the former rate of duty every lime kiln in St. John will soon be in active work, and many new kilns will be built by men who have been engaged in the lime business elsewhere, but who see in St. John a more profitable field for their enterprise than that in which they have been operating.

There are some persons intimately acquainted with the lime business of St. John, who predict that in a very short time after the new tariff goes into operation, the production of lime here will be giving employment to thousands of men, and the export of lime will reach more than $1,000,000 in value annually. It is needless to say that such a result would give a boom to the business of the city such as it has not experienced since the decline of shipbuilding, and that every interest in St. John will be favorably affected by it. A similar improvement, although on a smaller scale, will result from the removal of the duty on lumber and the export of that article may be expected to increase. The reduction in the duties on potatoes and other vegetables, on agricultural products and on cattle and horses, and the making of eggs free will also be of great benefit to our farmers, who will thus have a market of which they have been for some time deprived, restored to them. Agriculture in New Brunswick will become more profitable than it has been heretofore, and our young men will be encouraged to remain on their farms rather than become servants of others in a foreign country.

Now, Mr. President, I do not propose to take up more of the time of the Senate. There has been nothing from the other side that could be considered in the least degree an explanation of the provisions of this bill. I do not suppose that any budget was ever presented to the House of Commons without a labored and detailed statement. I am sure that no general tariff bill was ever before presented to either branch of Congress without such statement.

But in this case this great bill, revolutionary in its scope, avowedly an entire change in the principles upon which duties should be laid, has been put before the Senate, and neither Congress nor the people has been vouchsafed one word of explanation of its provisions. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], in opening the debate upon the bill, only dealt in generalities and in sweeping denunciations of the opponents of his theory, and of his bill, and of himself and his party politically; but no man has condescended upon the other side to come forth and declare upon what reasons these things which I have mentioned and which I might go on and multiply indefinitely are found in the bill.

Mr. President, the oppression of this bill upon the industries of the State of Maine is so great that neither I nor my colleague will allow it to rest with the protest which I am entering here. So indefensible are these provisions that, when the different paragraphs are reached in the bill, we shall present to the Senate in greater detail the merits of these Maine industries and the destructive nature of the provisions which work their ruin in the bill.

It is given to no man to predict what will be, in this body, the outcome of this bill. As I have said, the anxiety and solicitude of the country with regard to it are most profound. No tariff bill has evoked such a storm of protest and indignation, and as the days go by and the provisions of the bill are more completely understood the voice of the country rises higher and higher against it.

I have already alluded to the public expression of this feeling, as shown in the elections which have taken place since October last. It needs no prophetic ken to see what measure of punishment will be dealt to the authors and upholders of this measure whenever they fall into the people's hands.

If a straight-out vote could be had to-day in the Senate, representing the real convictions of Senators upon this bill, it would meet its death here without further word of debate.

Whether party pressure and the feeling that some bill must be passed or the party will be discredited will finally carry this bill through, I nor no man can say; but it will be debated and discussed in every paragraph till all its provisions are laid bare, and no man in the country, whatever may be his party or his employment, will be left without a full knowledge of all its defects and enormities. Whatever may happen, Mr. President, should the bill be crowded through by Administration and party pressure, I do not envy the task and the fate of the Senator upon this floor, or the Representative in another Chamber, who goes before the people and lifts in his hand, before them, the Wilson bill, with the Senate amendments, and upon it puts his fate to the touch of that public sentiment which will mete out to him and his course here exact justice.

APPENDIX B.

MEMORIAL FROM MAINE LUMBERMEN.

This memorial, presented by certain citizens of Maine, relates to that part of the tariff bill which places lumber on the free list.

The cut of logs in the State of Maine for the year 1893 is as follows:

	Feet.
Spruce	573,811,627
Pine	107,330,822
Hemlock	100,357,101
Cedar	60,904,701
Hard wood	7,177,147
Total	849,581,398

To haul these logs to the landings during the winter months requires the use of 5,666 pairs of horses and 30,000 men; making amount expended for labor in getting logs to landings about $6,000,000.

The cost of getting logs from the stump to the various sawmills, including cutting, hauling, driving, boomage, shorage, tolls, and other expenses, is, on an average, from $8 to $8.50 per thousand feet. The average cost of stumpage is $2, which makes the cost to the manufacturer of spruce logs delivered at the sawmills from $10 to $10.50 per thousand feet.

From 75 to 80 per cent of the cost of a cargo of sawed lumber is expended for labor, which is a larger percentage than on almost any other manufactured article.

American citizens doing business at St. John, under the act of Congress of March 16, 1866, have from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 feet of sawed lumber on hand, and from 90,000,000 to 100,000,000 feet of logs cut in 1892 and 1893, which are to be carried over and marketed in 1894. About 90 per cent of this amount is spruce.

About the usual cut is being made during this winter under the above act on the St. John River and its tributaries, which will add largely to the stock on hand to be marketed by American citizens at St. John in 1894.

American spruce logs lying in booms at St. John, side by side with provincial logs of same quality, sell in the open market from $1.50 to $2 per 1,000 feet more than provincial logs, and this notwithstanding that under the law as it is to-day round logs are admitted free of duty.

In proof of this fact you will find statement of American consul attached, marked "Exhibit A."

American citizens engaged in the manufacture and shipping of lumber to the States, under the act of 1866, will be placed at a great disadvantage should sawed lumber be immediately placed on the free list.

The effect for the next few years will be to transfer the greater part of the business now done in Maine under the act of 1866 to the provinces and into the hands of the provincials.

The cost of getting these State of Maine logs is considerably greater than on the provincial side, as we pay more for labor and supplies. Provincial logs cost from $1.50 to $2 less in the St. John market, as already shown by statement of American consul.

You will find statement attached, signed by American lumber manufacturers doing business in St. John under act of 1866, marked "Exhibit B."

There are now on hand 300,000,000 feet of logs and manufactured lumber cut in 1892-'93 on the Penobscot, Kennebec, St. Croix, Union, Machias, Androscoggin, and other rivers of Maine, which, had it not been for the panic, would nearly all have been marketed in 1893.

The cut of logs being made in Maine during the present winter will be about two-thirds as large as last year. This will give of stock on hand, cut in 1892, 1893, 1894, 879,000,000 to be marketed in 1894.

The price of sawed lumber, especially spruce, is lower than at any time during the last twenty-five years, thus showing that the present tariff has not been a hardship to the consumer.

In answer to certain theorists, who urge free lumber for the purpose of preserving the forests, we will say that our Eastern timber lands are different from those in any other part of the country. In fact, the trees grow like any other produce of the soil, and it is estimated by experts in the lumber business that a single Maine township of 22,000 acres renews its growth equal in amount to what six or eight horses, kept constantly at work, can haul to the landings.

In no other part of the world does the woods growth on land that has been cut or burned over recuperate as it does in the State of Maine and New Brunswick.

In the great forest fire of 1825, extending from the Penobscot waters in Maine to the Miramichi in New Brunswick, 600,000 acres of timber land was burned over, and so rapid was the new growth that large lumbering operations have been conducted on this same territory for a great many years, and to-day it is equal in value to the same number of acres in any other section of the Maine forests. The second growth was largely sapling pine, poplar, birch, and other hard woods which are valuable to-day for home and export trade.

Townships which have been cut upon constantly are to-day reckoned as the most valuable, for a judicious cutting of the large trees makes possible the more rapid growth of the smaller trees.

Our Maine forest lands produce spruce all the way from the seedling a foot high to the mature trees fit for the market, and we follow the practice of cutting the mature trees only.

A few years since many supposed that our spruce forests would be destroyed by the beetle, but it is now admitted by those who are familiar with this subject that the worms or beetles only attack the old trees which have commenced to decay. On townships where the old trees had been carefully cut none of this trouble existed, but it did to a great extent on townships which had not been operated upon. In no case, however, were the young and thrifty trees attacked by the worms.

That you may understand the extent of the lumbering interests in the State of Maine, will say that the books of the board of State assessors show that there are in the State of Maine 13,214,027 acres of timber land, and valued, for the purpose of State and county taxes, at $34,204,634, as per attached statement of the chairman of State of Maine board of assessors, marked "Exhibit C."

This does not include the large amount of capital invested in sawmills, machinery, etc., and in conducting lumbering operations which employ thousands of men, to whom higher wages are paid than by those engaged in the lumbering business in foreign countries.

We believe that sawed lumber can as well afford, without any hardship to the consumer, to pay the present revenue to the Government as any other article of merchandise upon which duty is placed.

To place sawed lumber upon the free list, especially during the existing panic, would cause great financial loss to many of our citizens who have a large amount of capital invested in lumbering operations.

With free sawed spruce, the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia lumbermen will not only compete to a greater extent than at present against the New England lumbermen, but also against those who are cutting spruce in West Virginia, and against the hard-pine interests of the Southern States.

If we are to have free lumber, our lumbermen should be placed upon an equality with those of New Brunswick. We should not be obliged to pay a duty upon hay, as under the present law, of $4 and under the proposed tariff of $2.

We should be allowed to bring our teams in bond for the purpose of cutting lumber in winter as we did during the reciprocity with Canada.

We should not be prevented by the contract labor law from contracting for our labor in Canada.

We know there are manufacturers in some of the States who are clamoring for free sawed lumber upon the ground that it is raw material. We object to their putting it upon this ground, as we have shown to you conclusively that the amount paid for labor on a cargo of lumber is from 75 to 80 per cent of the cost.

The lumber business of Maine makes the State a great consumer of Western products.

There is probably no State in the Union where Western farm products are so largely used, or the average is so high per capita, as in Maine.

The following amounts of Western farm products were brought into Maine during 1893 over the Maine Central Railroad's Ogdensburg division, and this does not include the amount of pork and beef in barrels: 332,429 barrels of flour; 1,630,433 bushels of corn; 572 772 bushels of oats; 18,486 tons of feed; 463 carloads of fresh beef.

We are not able to give the amounts brought by the Canadian Pacific to Greenville and other points on their road; nor by the Grand Trunk Railroad; nor of Western products coming by way of Boston, but taking the large amounts brought by the Maine Central, it must be readily seen that the combined amount of all transportation companies would be very large.

The shipment of spruce deals from New Brunswick to transatlantic ports for 1893 was 312,000,000 feet; from Nova Scotia, 109,252,930 feet. About 50,000,000 feet of spruce has been shipped annually from the provinces to the New York market, and a large amount of laths and long and short lumber has also been shipped to other American ports.

There is no market at transatlantic ports for laths and short lumber which are manufactured from the slabs or sidings of provincial logs, and these products have been shipped for a great many years to American ports wholly.

Admitting this short lumber free of duty would be practically making the lumbermen of the maritime provinces a present of that amount.

The selling price for provincial logs at the sawmills in St. John during the last year has averaged $6 per thousand feet, which is less than the average cost of getting logs from the stump to the Maine sawmills, without taking the cost of stumpage into consideration.

The following is the clause in all Government permits in New Brunswick, touching the right to raise the price of stumpage:

"SEC. 16. All timber licenses shall be subject to the right of the lieutenant-governor in council to increase the mileage on licenses and the stumpage on any class of lumber when deemed expedient, on due notice thereof being given in the Royal Gazette; such increase to take effect at and after the date of the next following annual renewal; and also to any further regulations that may be made by order of the lieutenantgo-vernor in council, for the purpose of expeditiously enforcing the payment or adjustment of stumpage on any logs or other lumber cut within the limit described in any license, or otherwise giving effect to or enforcing the conditions of the license."

Our provincial neighbors are able, on account of less cost of labor and cheaper supplies, to deliver their logs from the stump to the sawmills at about 25 per cent less than we can in Maine, and for this reason we believe that they should not have the right to compete and distribute in our market unless subject to a revenue tariff; otherwise they would have a great advantage over Maine lumbermen.

For proof of this fact, we again refer to statement of American consul, marked "Exhibit A."

For miles and miles their lumber lands are contiguous to ours as the provincial forests bound the east, north, and west lines of our State, situated upon good, navigable waters and offering good harbors for shipment.

The bill provides that in case any foreign government imposes an export duty on lumber shipped to the States, in the way of retaliation a duty shall be placed on it. This would be inoperative, so far as New Brunswick is concerned, as their government sells timber "limits," charging, at present, $1 per thousand feet stumpage, and, in addition to this, a small sum for taxes. The government reserves the right to raise the price of this stumpage at any time, which they can do and receive an additional revenue, as they would if they should impose an export duty.

EXHIBIT A.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
St. John, New Brunswick, December 27, 1893.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry of even date, as to logs cut in the forest of the State of Maine, on the St. John River and its tributaries, and floated down said river, to be sawed or hewn by American citizens in the province of New Brunswick, and thereafter shipped to the United States free of duty, under law of the United States passed by Congress March the 16th, 1866, I have to say that, having examined the records on file in this consulate, I find the cut of logs under the above act to average from 90,000,000 to 100,000,000 square feet each year for several years.

Of this amount 3,500,000 is pine, 7,000,000 cedar and the balance spruce.

And, further, upon inquiry of the manufacturers of lumber of this port, both provincial and American, I find that American logs, lying in booms side by side with provincial logs, sell from $1.50 to $2 per thousand square feet more than provincial logs, and this, notwithstanding that manufactured provincial logs can be imported into the United States free of duty.

Yours truly,

JOHN S. DERBY,
United States Consul.

Hon. JOHN P. BASS, Bangor, Me.

Another bad effect of placing lumber upon the free list would be to stimulate overproduction in Canada and a consequent oversupply in our markets, which, on account of our present overstock, could not do otherwise than cause serious loss to our lumbermen.

EXHIBIT B.

ST. JOHN, NEW BRUNSWICK, December 27, 1893.

GENTLEMEN: We understand that you are making an effort to have the free-lumber clause in the Wilson bill killed, or at least amended so that it will fall lighter on the lumbermen of Maine, and as fellow sufferers desire to make the following statements: That we as American citizens engaged in the cutting of logs in the forests in the State of Maine, situated on the St. John River and its tributaries, and in the manufacture of those logs at St. John, New Brunswick, as provided for in the act of Congress, March 16, 1866, which provides for the free importation of the product of these logs into the United States, desire to have your committee represent to the Committee on Ways and Means that should sawn lumber—especially spruce—be placed on the free list the effect will be to transfer the business now in Maine to the provinces and into the hands of the provincialists; that we have between 15,000,000 and 20,000,000 of said American sawn lumber ready to be marketed in 1894. We also have in stock of American logs cut in 1892 and 1893 from 90,000,000 to 100,000,000, which, on account of the general trade depression, the result of the panic, we have been obliged to carry over. In addition to this the present stock will be largely added to by the operations of this winter, 1893–'94, the preparations for which were made last spring, and the work being now well along, many of these logs it will be impossible to get marketed before July 1, 1895. The labor cost of getting these State of Maine logs is considerably greater than on the provincial side, as we pay more for labor and supplies. Provincial logs cost from $1.50 to $2 per thousand feet less.

Should lumber be placed on the free list as proposed by the Wilson bill it will cause the Americans manufacturing American logs in New Brunswick great financial loss.

Sawn lumber has sold the past year at less price than any time during the last twenty-five years, and the season of 1894 does not look at all encouraging, and with free lumber would be ruinous to us.

It would be a great injustice, as well as a hardship to the American citizens who are led to make large investments here to do business under the act of 1866 to put lumber on the free list before we have time to market our present stock.

EXHIBIT C.

[Copy of letter, on official paper, from Hall C. Burleigh, chairman of State of Maine Board of Assessors, to Hon. J. P. Bass, Bangor.]

Hon. J. P. BASS, Bangor, Me.:

MY DEAR SIR: On my arrival here this a. m. I find your letter of the 26th instant and hasten to reply, as follows:

The timber lands in the State of Maine amount to the following number of acres, and values:

	Acres.	Values.
Four hundred and eighty townships	9,263,138	$17,795,080
Public lots on same	385,589	415,214
Eighty plantations, about three-fourths timber	1,322,400	2,644,400
In the incorporated towns, estimated	2,225,000	13,350,000
Total	13,214,027	34,204,634

The number of acres of timber lands in the incorporated towns not being fully returned, I have made a careful but conservative estimate of number of acres and value, which I feel sure is considerably below a fair value.

Yours, very truly,

HALL C. BURLEIGH, Chairman.

Dated at Augusta, Me., December 27, 1893.

Cost calculated to draw logs.

One pair horses average 150,000 for the winter; 849,000,000 would require 5,666 pairs, at $40 per month, including teamster, each four months, would cost	$906,560
Four men to tend each pair, $18 per month, four months	1,631,708
Board pair horses, $1 per day	679,920
Board men, 40 cents per day, four months	1,359,840
	4,578,028

No account is taken of wood, or fuel.

The above would give an average cost of $5.39¼ per thousand feet for labor expended in getting logs to landings. All agree that the estimate is low enough; some maintain that in place of four men to each pair of horses, in addition to teamster, it takes six and one-fourth, which would enhance the cost.

It is somewhat difficult to get an estimate of exact cost of labor to get logs from landings to the various mills, including driving, boomage, shorage, tolls, and other expenses, but $8.50 is considered a very safe and conservative estimate of the cost of labor expended altogether on the logs when landed at the mills.

In the lumber mills of the Penobscot Valley there is a value of fully $905,000, employing 1,977 men at an average daily pay of $1.93 per man, making a daily pay roll of $3,815.80. This for 150 days would give $572,370, or for a total sawing season of seven months, an amount of $702,107.20 disbursed for labor only in the various mills in the Penobscot Valley.

We have a large amount of property in coasting vessels built for the transportation of lumber, and any legislation tending to decrease the shipments of lumber would cause this interest to suffer. The Provincial people build a cheaper class of vessels, and would, to a great extent, do their own freighting.

The eastern ports of the maritime provinces have a great advantage over the New England States in transatlantic shipment, while the western ports are able to ship to American ports at about the same freight rates as from our own ports.

The lumbermen of New Hampshire cut between 200,000,000 and 300,000,000 feet of spruce logs each year, and their interests will be affected the same as Maine and West Virginia.

The old growth pine has been largely cut off in the Eastern States and also in New Brunswick, the eastern lumbering business being largely confined to spruce, which is five times greater than either hemlock, pine, and cedar combined, as shown in statement attached and marked "Exhibit D."

Extent of an average establishment.

The average mill establishments in the United States has $24,131 capital, it employs 22 persons, pays $5,058 wages, and turns out annual product valued at $16,856. These figures, however, only include the census returns for mills having a product valued at $500 or more. There were, besides, nearly 3,000 smaller mills, the inclusion of which would considerably reduce the average stated. It will, therefore, be readily seen that no industry has a wider diffusion of petty establishments. To illustrate the proportion of large and small mills, it may be stated that only 2½ per cent of the total number (23,287) used 5,000,000 feet and upwards of logs or bolts annually; 16½ per cent used from 1,000,000 to 5,000,000 feet and 81 per cent used less than 1,000,000 feet.

The industry is conducted in every State and Territory of the Union, the greatest increase in the number of establishments having recently occurred in the South and on the Pacific coast.

AMERICAN CITIZENS VS. THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT.

The forests in Canada are all owned by the Government, which sells trees to the manufacturer as they are required for use. In the United States the forests are owned by the individual, such ownership ranging from the few acres of woodland found on every farm to the larger areas held by manufacturers. No other industry covers such a wide range of territory or involves the interests of so many people as that relating to forest products.

The forests of Maine and of New Brunswick, of Washington and of British Columbia, are only separated by an imaginary line, but the conditions affecting their utilization are widely divergent, as has been shown.

APPENDIX C.

LIME.

[No. 1—Manufacturers.]

CIRCULAR LETTER OF INQUIRY.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1893.

MY DEAR SIR: In former years when the question of the tariff was uppermost in the consideration of the people, circular letters were addressed to merchants, manufacturers, and producers representing the industrial elements of the community, and others, making inquiries as to the character and amount of their output, the capital invested, prices, wages, rates of import duties, etc. This was notably the case in 1845, under the direction of Secretary Walker; in 1882, through the Tariff Commission; and in 1885, under the direction of Secretary Manning.

The replies to such interrogatories furnish valuable statistics and other data, and materially aid in legislating upon the subject of customs duties.

With a view to securing such information, the Committee on Finance submit to you the following questions, which, they trust, you will formulate replies to, adding such general or special matter as you may be possessed of, and which, in your judgment, will be of value to the committee:

1. State name of corporation, firm, or individual, and character of manufacture.
2. State location of plant.
3. What amount of capital is invested?
4. When was the industry established?
5. State the amount of production, kinds, and value of articles manufactured annually since the establishment of your industry; description, value, and quantity for each year.
6. Have you at any time during the past two years been running less than full time, and if so, when, and why?
7. What rate of ad valorem (or specific) duty is necessary to place domestic products on an equal footing with foreign producers, and your reasons why?
8. If the rate of duty upon your class of manufacture were reduced one-third, what reduction in cost of production would be necessary?
9. Please state the domestic wholesale price of your goods in 1884, 1890, and 1892, and at the date of your answer.
10. To your knowledge has there been an increased competition in your line of manufactures, either foreign or domestic, during the past four years?
11. Do you desire a specific or an ad valorem duty, and why?
12. Are you manufacturing or producing as many goods or commodities as you were in 1892, and if not, why not?
13. What has been the tendency of wages during the past twelve months?
14. If possible will you give an estimate of the exact cost of living of the families of two or more of your skilled workmen, specifying as near as may be items of expenditure?
15. Have you any difficulty in construing the existing law in regard to importations of the class of articles you produce, and have you any suggestions to make?

16. Has the price of living in your locality increased or decreased during the past four years, and to what extent?
17. What in your opinion is the cause of the present depression in trade, and what would be your remedy to correct it?
18. What component materials of your manufacture are, to you, raw materials?
19. Are the goods you manufacture luxuries or necessities?
20. What rate of interest are you compelled to pay on loans?
21. What effect has immigration had on your business?
22. What proportion of skilled labor do you employ?
23. How do you propose to meet any reduction of duty on the goods you manufacture?
24. Give the number of men, women, and children employed, and state the wages you pay for ordinary and skilled labor.
25. How many hours per week are they employed?
26. Do foreign articles of like kind enter into competition, and to what extent?
27. What proportion of your manufacture is exported, and do you realize a less price therefrom than from domestic consumption?
28. Has the cost of manufacture increased or decreased since 1883, and to what extent?
29. Has the increase or decrease been in materials or labor?
30. Have your selling prices increased or decreased since 1890?
31. What amount of the agricultural production of the country is consumed in your manufacture, or through it, indirectly or directly, and what amount of other domestic productions?
32. What component materials are used in your manufacture on which you pay a specific or an ad valorem duty? Give the rates of duty.
33. If your raw material were free would there be any necessity for a customs duty on the manufactured product?
34. Please state the wholesale prices for 1884, 1890, and 1892. Have these prices increased or decreased since 1892?
35. What changes, if any, do you recommend of existing rates of duty or administrative customs laws?

The committee are desirous that your reply shall give a full expression of your views and not be restricted to merely answering the questions categorically. It, however, should be confined to your specific business and expressed as concisely as possible.

Publicity will not be given to names or locations of business if you so desire.

Please make your reply on the inclosed blanks and return it in the accompanying envelope.

Very respectfully,

D. W. VOORHEES, Chairman.

REPLY TO CIRCULAR LETTER OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE, UNITED STATES SENATE, RELATIVE TO CUSTOMS LEGISLATION.

Answers to questions.

1. S. E. & H. L. Shepherd; manufacturers of lime, organized 1892, including S. E. & H. L. Shepherd and O. P. Shepherd.
2. Rockport, Me.
3. One hundred thousand dollars, and fully paid-up certificates issued for this amount.
4. Established 1845.
5. Lime was manufactured from 1845 to about 1860 in a small way, operating during the last-named year three old-fashioned kilns, with a possible capacity of 500 barrels per week for the three kilns. About 1860 one patent kiln was built in place of one of the old-fashioned ones. This made the possible capacity about 25,000 to 28,000 barrels per year: these were operated until 1868, when another patent kiln was added to the plant in place of the two remaining old-fashioned kilns. This gave a possible capacity of about 45,000 barrels per year. From 1868 to 1873 the average output, as near as we can estimate it without going into details, was from 28,000 to 33,000 per year. The business then dropped off from 1873 to about 1883, part of which was due to the fact that the Dominion of Canada placed a specific duty of 20 cents per barrel on our lime, which resulted in closing those markets to us. Notwithstanding this, by persistent efforts we were enabled to increase our trade in the United States, so that in 1886 we built an additional kiln. In 1887 another kiln was purchased in connection with O. P. Shepherd, and in 1891 we purchased the G. F. Burgess lime plant, consisting of two kilns, so that at the present time we have six kilns in all, with a capacity, if we run every day in the year, of 240,000 to 250,000 barrels per year. But the largest amount we have been able to find a market for in any one year was 1892, when our output was about 160,000 barrels. We manufactured in 1893 120,000 barrels. The average price for each year, as near as we can estimate it, would not exceed 70 cents per barrel.
6. During the winter months very little lime is used, comparatively, which makes it necessary to close nearly our entire works from about the 15th of December to the middle of March. Eighteen hundred and ninety-two proved to be an exceptional year; but owing to the condition of business in 1893 our sales dropped off materially.
7. A specific duty of 6 cents per 100 pounds is not an excessive rate to place domestic products on an equal footing with foreign producers, by reason of their natural advantages and the fact that labor can be secured at a very much less rate in the Dominion of Canada and province of Quebec than here—the rate there (as shown by letters in our possession, which we herewith attach) ranging from 90 cents for very coarse to $1.50 per day for skilled—and the fact that about 90 per cent of the cost of a barrel of lime is labor, and we are obliged to pay here from $2 to $2.50 per day for same kind of work.
8. A corresponding reduction in the rate of wages.
9. Wholesale price, free on board at kilns: 1884, 75 cents; 1890, 77 cents; 1892, 70 cents; 1893, 70 cents.
10. During the years 1889 and 1890 there was a large increase in competition. From 1890, owing to increased protection, competition has not been so great. (See answer to question 26.)
11. We desire a specific duty, as we can better determine by it the actual amount of duty that will be collected on a barrel of lime.
12. No; on account of decreased demand and competition from business stagnation.
13. Uniform.
14. Average earnings about $500; $300 for food and clothing; $60 to $75 for rent.
15. No; perfectly satisfied with present law.
16. Not materially; if anything, slightly decreased.
17. Agitation of the tariff and financial question. Speedy disposition of the bill pending, with a view of protecting American industries.
18. The whole.
19. Necessities.
20. Usually 6 per cent; past year 6 per cent to 7 per cent.
21. None.
22. About four-fifths of labor employed receives the highest rate of wages paid by us, owing to the peculiar mixed conditions of our lime-rock deposit.
23. By reducing price of labor.
24. About 90 to 100 men when running full capacity. (See answer to 7.)
25. On kilns 84 hours. In quarries and other work 60 hours.
26. Yes. In 1890 the value of foreign lime sold in our markets was about $145,000; 1891, something over $100,000; 1892, between $80,000 and $70,000; 1893, $14,418.50.
27. None since the imposition of a specific duty of 20 cents per barrel by the Dominion of Canada and Americans introduced into that country our methods for manufacturing lime.
28. Increased slightly, owing to labor combination.
29. Labor.
30. Decreased.
31. Such as would be consumed by the number of employés.
32. None.
33. Raw (wood) materials are free.
34. (See answer 9.)
35. The existing rate of duty on lime is very satisfactory to us.

RIVERTON, WARREN COUNTY, February 12, 1894.

DEAR SIR: We respectfully submit the following answers to your circular No. 1, dated December 20, 1893:

1. Carson Lime Company.
2. Riverton, Warren County, Va.
3. Capitalized at $150,000, and fully paid up certificates issued for this amount.
4. The industry was established in 1869; incorporated in 1891.
5. Beginning in a small way in 1869 our business has increased year by year until 1892, in which year we sold (computing bulk lime as 2½ bushels to barrel) 93,731 barrels. In 1893 our sales fell off to 88,979 barrels, or over 5 per cent. The value of building lime in 1892 was 61 cents per barrel at the kilns, while in 1893 the price had fallen to 58½ cents per barrel on a diminished output.
6. In 1893 we ran less than full time owing to the financial stringency and general depression of business.
7. As regards the increase of disaster to our Virginia lime industries (and we speak of fourteen such throughout the State), a comparative statement of the cost of foreign lime from New Brunswick with our Virginia lime on tidewater of Virginia and the Carolinas will afford the most concise information. As labor is about the same in either case I will leave that out of the computation. Taking the statements of the Whitney syndicate as to their ability with improved methods to put coal on vessels at $1.10 per ton, the fuel in a barrel of lime would be, allowing 50 cents freight or $1.60 per ton at St. John, New Brunswick, 4.88 cents per barrel; freight to Virginia tidewater, Norfolk, 18 cents; customs duty, 3 cents; total, 25.88 cents per barrel.

Lime made at Riverton, Va., costs with coal of like character at $2.95 per ton for fuel, 9 cents per barrel; freight to Norfolk, 22 cents per barrel; total, 31 cents per barrel, or a difference of 5.12 cents in favor of the New Brunswick lime.

If you take Charleston, S. C., the case is even worse for the Virginia lime manufacturers.

St. John lime.

	Cents.
Fuel	4.88
Freight	25.00
Duty	3.00
Total	32.88

Virginia lime.

	Cents.
Fuel	9.00
Freight	39.90

Difference against Virginia lime, 16.02.

Looking these facts in the face, an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent as provided by the Wilson bill is insufficient. As Democrats committed to the tariff reform we are willing to submit to an equal fight, but we do not expect to be smitten in the house of our friends, and therefore will accept a cut of 25 per cent on the McKinley bill, or 4½ cents per 100 pounds, which would give us 9.75 per barrel. This is not enough to maintain the present prices of labor and do the expected fighting with the Frank Jones syndicate and its unlimited capital, but we shall ask the railroads to do the rest.

8. The reduction with a tariff cut of one-third would need to be 10 per cent in cost of production.
9. This is partly answered under question 5. From 1834 to 1892 the price was 12½ to 15 cents more than in 1892 to 1893.
10. Competition has greatly increased within the last five years.
11. We desire a specific duty because the cask or barrel is two-thirds the value of a barrel of lime under an ad valorem duty. This will be imported absolutely free, enhance the value of the Wilson bill to the foreigner, with a corresponding disadvantage to us. It would take an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent to put us on an equality with the New Brunswick people, as shown under question 7.
12. See question 6.
13. The tendency of wages has been downward.
14. We employ common labor, and cannot answer with anything like accuracy.
15. We suggest that the law as affecting lime be guarded so as to apply the duty to the barrel or cask as well as the contents.
16. Living expenses have decreased in bread, sugar, and clothing. Meats are no lower.
17. Lack of confidence brought about by speculation and overtrading. More simplicity in living, greater honesty, and especially less politics.
18. All raw material.
19. Necessities.
20. Six per cent.
21. None.
22. Virtually none.
23. Reduced below the rates asked for we must cut the laborers' wages.
24. We have between 90 to 100 men and boys employed.
25. Ten hours per day, average about fifty hours per week.
26. Not now, but with a reduction of over 400 per cent in duty the foreigner will have the matter pretty much his own way at our ports.
27. We export none.
28. Cost has decreased 7½ to 10 per cent.
29. Decrease in materials and improved methods.
30. Decreased.
31. Indirectly, we would say 50 per cent through our men's living and fuel.
32. Nothing.
33. Do not apply to us.

34. Already answered.

35. We recommend none, but will accept what we have named under question 7. If the Wilson bill levied duties upon all alike, we would not have one word to say against it, but when it leaves cement, an article used for the same purpose, at McKinley rates and reduces the rate on lime 400 per cent it is not fair. Again, the Wilson bill protects pig iron 20 per cent. There can be no sufficient reason why lime should be singled out for slaughter when other and similar articles are taken care of and these articles thus cared for are not as liable to suffer as the lime industry, because of the natural advantages of the New Brunswick quarries and the gigantic moneyed corporation that is behind them, as shown by the following from the St. John Telegraph:

"There are some persons intimately acquainted with the lime business of St. John who predict that in a very short time after the new tariff goes into operation, the production of lime here will be giving employment to thousands of men, and the export of lime will reach more than $1,000,000 in value annually. It is needless to say that such a result would give a boom to the business of the city such as it has not experienced since the decline of shipbuilding, and that every interest in St. John would be favorably affected by it."

Respectfully submitted.

RICHARD McCOY, Vice-President.

To Hon. D. W. VOORHEES,
Chairman Finance Committee, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

To the Ways and Means Committee:

The undersigned petitioners respectfully represent that without exception they are all citizens of the United States and residents of Knox County, Me.; that their principal and particular business is that of manufacturing lime for domestic sale, and that the great bulk of the population of their section has depended for more than one hundred years, and depends now upon the lime-burning industry for its material welfare and prosperity. Your petitioners also represent that the lime market in the New England States and in New York is not now controlled, nor has it ever been controlled, by the output of Knox County lime, and in support of this statement submit that lime is manufactured in more than twenty States in the Union, and that Knox County furnishes only about one-thirty-seventh of all the lime produced in the United States.

Prior to the year 1890 a very considerable amount of foreign lime was manufactured and imported to the United States. This was made possible by the low price of foreign labor; and had such manufacture and importation continued to increase, as it did from the year 1885 to the year 1890, your petitioners represent that all their markets would have been lost to them, or they would have been compelled to reduce their scale of wages to correspond with foreign labor.

Your petitioners further represent that the lime market is not now, nor has it ever been entirely controlled and manipulated by a combination or trust composed of lime manufacturers in Knox County. They submit that lime is a perishable article, and that the lime market is variable, owing to uncertain competition and uncertain periods of building activity. To preserve the industry from losses growing out of these causes, a portion of the lime manufacturers at different times have undertaken in a lawful and prudent way to restrict the production of lime to correspond with a healthy and legitimate demand.

Your petitioners deny that either an artificial demand or a higher price has ever been created by the curtailing of production of lime in Knox County or by the shutting down of all the kilns. At no time has curtailment of production accomplished more than sustaining normal prices for lime, and the nonexistence of a trust has, as a matter of fact, rendered the shutting down of all the kilns for the alleged purposes absolutely impossible.

Your petitioners further represent that the lime manufacturers of Knox County have never been without local competition, and submit this fact as additional evidence in support of their statement that there has never been any arrangement whereby it has been possible to close all the kilns for the purpose of creating a higher price or an artificial demand for lime. They submit also that because of this inevitable local competition and competition from sections outside of Knox County there has never been a time within their recollection when the markets would take the whole production of the kilns of Knox County if all the kilns were in operation.

Your petitioners deny that rates of freight on lime shipped from points in the Provinces to lime markets in the New England States are in every case more than the rates paid or obtained by the manufacturers of Knox County to those same markets; and submit that in many instances the rates of freight are decidedly in favor of the foreign manufacturer, and that this statement of fact applies particularly to lime manufactured in the Province of Quebec and shipped by rail to the interior cities and towns in New England.

Your petitioners further submit that, with the possible exception of foremen, all the labor entering into the cost of producing lime can properly be called coarse labor; that such labor in Knox County is paid from $2 to $2.50 per day, and in the provinces from $1 to $1.50 per day, and that in both sections a working day on the kiln consists of twelve hours. There has been no material change in the relative cost of labor since the last revision of the tariff, and for the details of such cost your petitioners respectfully refer to the tables prepared and printed on pages 491 to 492 of the Hearings Before the Committee on Ways and Means, Fifty-first Congress, first session, 1889 and 1890. They further state that a considerable portion of the lime manufactured in Knox County is burnt over a fuel of coal and also of oil, and that they see no cause for alarm over the proposition of the Dominion Government to place an export duty on wood. Your petitioners declare also that since the revision of the tariff, lime has been and is to-day selling in open markets at a price 5 cents to 10 cents per barrel less than was obtained prior to that date, and that Canadian lime has been, and is to-day, selling in certain markets at a higher price than a considerable portion of the lime manufactured in Knox County.

Your petitioners deny that enormous fortunes have been made by the manufacturers of lime in Knox County, as has been represented to your body, but admit that labor in Knox County is well paid, and that its business men and its laborers view with well-founded alarm any movement to restrict the present scope or growth of the lime industry.

Your petitioners further submit that the statements herein expressed have been made only after the utmost care in collecting facts; that a most thorough and candid examination and investigation of their truth is earnestly invited and desired, and your petitioners pray that such an examination and investigation may result in the preservation of the lime industry under the existing tariff laws.

F. COBB & CO.,
A. F. CROCKETT COMPANY,
S. E. & H. L. SHEPHERD COMPANY, and others.

NOTE.—This petition was signed by all the manufacturers of Knox County, some twenty-five or thirty in number, with but one exception, which was due to the manufacturer in question being absent at the time.

Mr. PEFFER addressed the Senate in continuation of the speech begun by him on Friday, April 6. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. QUAY (at 4 o'clock p. m.) said: Mr. President, I suggest that there is not a quorum of the Senate present.

Mr. HARRIS. I regard that suggestion as a violation of the consent rule that was agreed upon yesterday. But the Senator from Pennsylvania will judge for himself as to the course he should take. The consent rule was that the consideration of the pending bill should proceed from 1 until 5 o'clock without interruption.

Mr. QUAY. I did not so understand the agreement, but if that was the intendment of the proposition made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and accepted by the Senator from Tennessee, of course I will withdraw the call.

Mr. PEFFER. Certainly.

Mr. MANDERSON. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee that that was the agreement, and yet I have been surprised at the suggestion made by several Senators that they thought it would not be a violation of the agreement. I do not want to take up any time, but I think it would be well to have the consent agreement read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HARRIS. I am sure that such was the intention of the Senator from Rhode Island and myself, who perhaps had more to do with the consent agreement than any other two Senators.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw the suggestion. I suppose the only way in which it can be withdrawn is by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to that. I feel, however, that it is rather a novel position we have gotten ourselves into, that one member on the majority side and three members on the minority side, besides the speaker, making five present, as was the case some time during the afternoon, should be considered the Senate of the United States to listen to an exposition of the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly. I am through.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senate is not in half as bad condition as the Senator from Nebraska would have us understand.

Mr. MANDERSON. Not now.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I suppose the arrangement between the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Tennessee does not bind anybody who was not consulted or did not have anything to do with it; and I tnink many of us would feel at perfect liberty to move that the Senate adjourn or proceed to the consideration of executive business, or that the roll be called to secure the presence of a quorum. But the Senator from Kansas is proceeding in such a happy manner in his remarks that I myself do not care to interpose for the purpose of securing a quorum or for any other purpose.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think there is one matter that should be understood. We have always considered that a unanimous-consent agreement made in the Senate would bind the entire Senate, even those who might be absent at the time it was made. I am sure that has been the usual practice in the Senate.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is true, but as I understood the agreement made yesterday, it was an agreement between the Senator from Rhode Island, who said he represented the one side of the Chamber, and the Senator from Tennessee, assuming to represent the other side of the Chamber. I so understood it. I heard the announcement, and my impression is the RECORD so states.

Mr. HAWLEY. But unanimous consent was asked by the Chair, and given, as has always been done in such cases.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I did not so understand it.

Mr. VEST. There was unanimous consent given.

Mr. HARRIS. The Chair put the question, and unanimous consent was given. I beg to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that during the few years I have been here a unanimous-consent agreement has been held invariably to bind all Senators, whether present at the time the agreement was entered into or not, just so far as any Senator is bound by it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I beg to say that during the many years I hope the Senator from Tennessee will continue to adorn the Senate he will find those agreements treated with the same inviolability. I am stating what I understood to be the arrangement made the other day. If there was a consent agreement, of course I should not think of interfering with it.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN in the chair). The Senator from Oregon will state his point of order.

Mr. MANDERSON. If I may be permitted, I think I can refer to the page of the RECORD stating the agreement.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I accept the statement of the Senator from Tennessee in regard to it.

Mr. DOLPH. My point of order is that everything that has occurred since the Senator from Pennsylvania suggested the want of a quorum has been contrary to the rules; that the Senate can not transact any business, and no discussion is in order after that suggestion was made. It may be that the Senator from Pennsylvania would like to withdraw it, but it is a suggestion, as was determined by the Senate a day or two ago, which can not be withdrawn. The rules are imperative that when there is a suggestion made of the lack of a quorum there must be a call of the Senate. If it should affect this case only I should not suggest this point of order, but I should not like to have it become a precedent for the future.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon makes the point of order that the suggestion of the want of a quorum can not be withdrawn?

Mr. DOLPH. That is the point of order.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think it can be withdrawn unless there be objection to its withdrawal. I do not understand the Senator from Oregon to object to the withdrawal of the suggestion.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Pennsylvania has asked leave to withdraw it.

Mr. MANDERSON. Here is the unanimous-consent agreement as it appears in to-day's RECORD. That there may be no misunderstanding, I read from the suggestion made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. I read only that part which refers to it.

That the tariff bill shall be taken up for consideration at 1 o'clock and remain before the Senate until 5 o'clock each day; that there shall be no dilatory motions and no votes of any kind, and that the discussion shall proceed within those hours.

That seems to have been the gist of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HOAR. If there is no one to speak at a particular time, we could adjourn of course.

Mr. DOLPH. Allow me to say that the Senator from Maine when in the chair only two or three days ago ruled that the suggestion of the lack of a quorum can not be withdrawn.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum. My understanding is we can by unanimous consent do anything here that is within the Constitution of the United States and the laws.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me the trouble with the suggestion as a matter of order is that when it is made there is no evidence that there is any Senate to consent unanimously or otherwise to anything, except to do what the rule provides can be done when a quorum is not present. I do not myself object personally to the withdrawal of the suggestion, but I do not think the proceeding is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The judgment of the Chair is, on the point of order made, that the suggestion of the lack of a quorum can not be withdrawn. The Chair thinks it is its duty to order a call of the roll. The Secretary will, therefore, call the roll.

Mr. QUAY. Then I have only to say that I regret exceedingly to have interposed the suggestion, and I apologize to the Senator from Tennessee for violating the agreement, which I did not understand at the time was meant to cover a call of the roll.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania is suspected of having intentionally violated the agreement.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Dolph,	Hunton,	Sherman,
Bate,	Dubois,	Kyle,	Squire,
Berry,	Frye,	Lindsay,	Turpie,
Blackburn,	Gallinger,	Manderson,	Vest,
Brice,	Gibson,	Martin,	Vilas,
Butler,	Gordon,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Caffery,	Gray,	Pasco,	Walsh,
Call,	Hale,	Peffer,	Washburn,
Chandler,	Harris,	Pettigrew,	Wolcott.
Coke,	Hawley,	Power,
Daniel,	Hill,	Proctor,
Davis,	Hoar,	Quay,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. PEFFER resumed his speech; and after having spoken altogether nearly two hours,

Mr. QUAY (at 5 o'clock p. m.) said: I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that the term of the tariff discussion for the day has expired.

[Mr. PEFFER'S speech will be published entire after it shall have been concluded. See Appendix.]

Mr. HARRIS. I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] desires to occupy the attention of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. VILAS. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me leave to make a request?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. VILAS. I ask to be excused from further service as chairman of the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Wisconin still remains a member of the committee, of course, but resigns the chairmanship only?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. GORMAN. I send a resolution to the desk, for which I ask present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Senator WALSH be assigned to the following committees:
Quadro-Centennial (Select), chairman.
Post-Offices and Post-Roads.
Relations with Canada (Select).
National Banks (Select).
Private Land Claims.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] be made the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

TARIFF COMPILATION.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask leave at this time to report from the Committee on Printing a concurrent resolution, which I send to the desk, for which I ask present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of the compilation prepared under the direction of the Committee on Finance, embracing a reprint of House bill No. 4864 with Senate amendments thereto, suggested by the Committee on Finance, together with the existing tariff law and the Mills bill of 1888, with comparative statement as to rates of duty, etc., for the use of the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. I desire to state to the Senate that the resolution is reported from the Committee on Printing for the reason that there seems to be in quite a number of the standing committees a misapprehension in regard to orders which have been heretofore passed by the Senate authorizing committees to have such printing done as they may desire. The law and the rules of the Senate provide that not more than $500 worth of printing of additional copies of documents shall be made on any such order. Our attention in the Committee on Printing has been called by the Public Printer to the fact that in some cases committees have exceeded the amount. His attention has been called to the act of Congress, and he has been instructed not to exceed the amount of $500 in any case. Hence the necessity for the passage of this resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think perhaps it should be stated, in addition to the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Printing, that as to certain committees of the Senate there was special authorization by the body that they might print such matter as they desired; but certainly that consent or authorization of the Senate would not permit an expenditure for any one purpose to exceed the amount of $500. I do not think that this consent was needed. Certainly under the practice or custom of the Senate any committee has the right, within that limit, to print matter that it is supposed to need for purposes of the intelligent investigation of any subject, and it is a privilege that I do not understand has ever been abused. I take it, however, that the Committee on Finance, in the publication of the important matter which they have given to us, have probably exceeded that limit, and I think there ought to be some corrective, at least a reminder, that no committee has a right to exceed an expenditure of $500 for printing even under the authorization of the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. My colleague on the committee will remember that sections 3789, 3794, and 3795 of the Revised Statutes provide that neither House of Congress shall order more than $500 worth of printing of additional copies without the concurrent action of the two Houses, and that all orders from committees must of necessity pass through the office of the Secretary of the Senate, the estimate to be filed there.

I desired to call the attention of the Senate to the subject at this time, because there has been some difficulty, not alone with the Finance Committee, but with other committees, as appears from statement of the accounts of the Public Printer.

I ask that the resolution may be passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

HOWARD'S PAPER ON THE LABOR PROBLEM.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. KYLE on the 2d instant, reported it without amendment; and the resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Education and Labor 1,000 copies of Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 95, entitled A Solution of the Labor Problem.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask what disposition was made concerning the paragraph last read. Of course I understand the bill is not subject to amendment at this reading. I understood from the Senator from Missouri that there would be some matters to which he desired to call the attention of the Senate in connection with the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that we finish the reading of the bill and act on the committee amendments, and then we can take up the question to which he refers.

Mr. MANDERSON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, beginning on page 6, at line 23, under the head of "Department of Justice."

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The Secretary read the first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, which was, on page 7, after line 21, to insert:

District attorneys: For fees of United States district attorneys, $101,000.

Mr. MANDERSON. This, I think, is the fifth—if not the fifth, the fourth—urgent deficiency appropriation bill which has come to the Senate originating under the law in the House of Representatives since the Fifty-third Congress commenced its session. I have sent for the different bills which have heretofore passed and was engaged in a computation of the amounts appropriated by them. They run certainly into several millions of dollars, and I think it would be of value to the Senate and of great interest to the country if the Senator from Missouri, in charge of the bill, would give us a statement of the amounts involved in and the necessity for these constantly recurring deficiency bills, which in number and in amount, I think, are unprecedented.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Nebraska knows just as well as I do the necessity for them.

Mr. MANDERSON. No; I do not believe I do.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are necessary simply because the House of Representatives does not in the regular appropriation bills make sufficient appropriations to carry on the operations of the Government during the fiscal year. That is all, and the deficiency has to be supplied. I do not know whether this will be the last of the urgent deficiencies. I can not tell that. I am not responsible for it.

I have not had any calculations made as to the amounts involved in these urgent deficiency bills, because they come on us as this bill comes, in an emergency, and we are compelled to pass them.

I will say, however, to the Senator from Nebraska, that long before this session closes and long before the election, when he wants to use the information, he will have all the data; and I shall furnish them to him, showing exactly how much has been appropriated in these deficiency bills.

We all know perfectly well to whom the deficiencies are charged. They are charged to the Congress which makes the appropriations for that fiscal year. Of course there is no disposition on this side of the Chamber to evade responsibility for anything of the kind. We shall have a full statement when the time comes; but I did not think it was a proper thing to waste time and labor in preparing a statement of deficiencies now. We have not yet received the general deficiency bill, which is the main one. The bills which have been passed are only urgent deficiency bills. The Senate Committee on Appropriations has added to the items already in the pending bill a number of other items necessary for running the United States courts and providing for certain expenses connected with the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope the Senator from Missouri, whose honesty of purpose and whose entire candor no man ever questions, will not suppose for an instant that my inquiry was meant as any reflection upon him.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly not.

Mr. MANDERSON. Or even upon the party of which he is such an honored and efficient member.

The Senator says that at some time in the dim and distant future there will be prepared for us a statement showing what these deficiencies are. It seems to me that one might retort to that statement that "Now is the accepted time," now is the day of deficiency bill No. 5, and we are told that these are simply preliminary skirmishes to the great deficiencies which shall come with what is known as the general deficiency bill.

I think, Mr. President, that it is unprecedented that at any Congress there has come this repetition, an interminable repetition of deficiency bills. I ask the Senator whether he remembers, in his long experience in this body, that during a session of Congress, before the general deficiency bill came to us, there were four or five urgent deficiency bills, and especially have there been urgent deficiency bills, in small or great number, which have involved the large amounts which are incorporated in these different bills?

I have here one which passed the Senate on the 21st day of December, 1893, and that was the third deficiency bill of this Congress. In running my pencil over the amounts involved I find, though I am only half through the bill, I have already reached about $950,000 in this one bill.

It is important, it seems to me, for the proper consideration of this bill to vindicate the Congress of the United States before the country for these enormous appropriations, that we should know the reason for this shortage, not in general terms, for we all know that. We know that these deficiency bills, small or large, whether they are few or whether they are numerous, are necessary because the Congress of the United States did not in passing the appropriation bills last year provide, as Congress should have provided, for the absolute necessities of the Government. That is a general answer that does not need to be made. We all know that. What we wish to know is the reason for the shortage of appropriations made for the fiscal year 1894, ending June 30, which requires that we should pass these numerous bills coming to us at the extra session and coming to us at this session, which is the first regular session of this Congress.

I hope the Senator will not at all reflect upon me as desiring to make political capital from my inquiry. I desire the information not only for my own benefit and for the benefit of other Senators who may be interested in this behalf, but it is due to the country that it should know why it is these great deficiency bills, running into millions of money, should come here in constant parade and procession, and why we can not wait until the final general deficiency bill comes, which we are promised hereafter.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, we have already passed four deficiency bills. The first was the urgent deficiency bill for the recoinage of silver coin, carrying an appropriation of $306,000. Then there was passed an urgent deficiency bill for assistant custodians of public buildings, etc., amounting to $370,588.33; a further urgent deficiency bill for customs, census, etc., for $1,889,455.86; and a further urgent deficiency bill for the United States courts, amounting to $768,268, making an aggregate of $3,334,322.19 which has already been appropriated. The pending bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, carries $1,242,255.66. The Senate Committee on Appropriations has added to it some $500,000.

Mr. President, as I understand and as the Senate, I hope, will understand, these deficiencies in the appropriations of the last Congress are largely because the estimates of the expenditures of the Government were not covered by the appropriations actually made. In other words, the amount estimated and the amount that was deemed necessary to carry on the Government by the Executive Administration then in existence was not appropriate.

As a matter of course I can not speak for others. I can not tell why certain bills are prepared in a certain way. I do not know. If I were preparing an appropriation bill I would appropriate the exact amount I thought necessary for that branch of service for the entire fiscal year, and then if I could I would make it a criminal offense for the Executive Administration to expend more than that sum. But we do not originate the appropriation bills and we can not control the amount. We frequently increase the amount, and sometimes we are charged with being extravagant and prodigal; the Senate is called the House of Lords; and it is charged that we are not careful and mindful of the people's interests and their pocketbooks. I know, and all the Senate knows, that has been done repeatedly somewhere or other in the world and the responsibility has been attempted to be thrown upon us for any increase of the kind.

Not a Cabinet officer, but an administrative officer, in speaking before a subcommittee the other day, in explaining why only a certain amount was appropriated, said that he had been requested to give the amount that would be necessary up to the 4th of March or the 1st of March; that that was all the bill was intended to cover. I was not present, and I do not know by what authority he made that statement; but, nevertheless, he made the statement to us that in the preparation of the bill it was only intended to cover the time up to the 4th of March.

Mr. MANDERSON. Was not that a practical violation of the law which requires that the estimate made shall be one that will carry to the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. COCKRELL. The estimate made in the Book of Estimates is always for the entire year, but this is what was necessary for a certain time; the time was fixed at the 1st of March, and it was the amount necessary up to that time.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then it was purely a violation of the law.

Mr. COCKRELL. He was under the impression that it was intended in the bill only to cover up to that time. The Senator knows perfectly well, if that be the case, that at the next session of Congress we shall be called upon to appropriate an urgent deficiency for the remainder of the year. As a matter of course we can not avoid these things. This is an urgent deficiency bill; we have simply added to it those items; we have given the amount absolutely necessary to carry on the courts, and we have added a few other items.

Mr. CHANDLER. I certainly do not wish to decry my own profession of the law, but it does seem to me that the item which the committee have inserted in the bill for the payment of fees of district attorneys ought to be explained more satisfactorily than the chairman of the committee has yet explained it. Now, look at the propositions which are not contained in the bill as it passed the other House, but which the Senator from Missouri brings in here as Senate amendments.

District attorneys: For fees of United States district attorneys, $101,000.

Is that a deficiency which could have been foreseen, or is it a deficiency which could not have been foreseen? That is a very large sum to add to the fees of forty-four district attorneys of the country. How it happens that the regular appropriation bill for the expenses of the judicial department of the Government was $101,000 below the amount necessary to pay the fees of district attorneys for the year, it seems to me, requires explanation.

For special compensation to United States district attorneys, $10,000.

That is a very large sum.

For regular assistants to United States district attorneys, $21,000.
For special assistants to United States district attorneys, $30,000.

In these days of poverty and distress I think that these items in this appropriation bill for extra compensation to the United States district attorneys and the regular assistants to the United States district attorneys and the special assistants to the United States district attorneys ought to be explained.

I ask the Senator from Missouri to tell us, when he next addresses the Senate, whether any report is made that explains why these enormous deficiencies have occurred in the appropriation for the payment of the district attorneys of the country and their regular assistants and special assistants. I can understand that there might be a deficiency for fees of clerks.

For fees of clerks, United States courts, $116,000.
For fees of commissioners, United States courts, $187,200.

Those are very large appropriations. I can see that it is not possible, when making an estimate, to tell exactly how much would be required for fees of clerks or fees of commissioners; but I can not understand why there should have been such a miscalculation as to the fees of the district attorneys and their special and regular assistants.

There is another appropriation here that is equally unintelligible to me:

Rent of court rooms: For rent of court rooms, United States courts, $42,000.

Is that for court rooms to be hereafter rented, or is it for court rooms which have been already rented; and if they have been already rented, by what authority have court rooms been rented to the extent of $42,000 more than the appropriation for the year authorized?

I say, as does the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], that in asking these questions we make no imputation upon the chairman of the Senate committee himself. We are inclined, of course, to vote for the passage of an appropriation bill that he reports, even if there are almost no other members of the Committee on Appropriations upon the floor to make explanation of them. But when the other House refuses, in the first instance, to make the necessary appropriations of this kind, when the fourth or fifth deficiency bill passes the House, and when the Senate Committee on Appropriations come in here and ask that these large sums of money shall be added by the Senate to the bill, to be charged up to the Senate, in the popular judgment, it does seem as if there ought to be a written statement or an oral statement putting the blame for this deficiency where it belongs, either upon the executive branch of the Government or upon the House of Representatives, taking the blame off from the Senate and taking the blame off from the chairman and the other members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

I respectfully ask the Senator from Missouri whether he can give us any intelligent and satisfactory reason why we should appropriate these sums, $101,000, $10,000, $21,000, and $30,000, for the district attorneys of the United States, paying them moneys which we have not yet appropriated for services and expenses during the present year?

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will take up his copy of the bill he will find, lines 15 and 16, on page 7, as follows:

Fees of marshals: For fees and expenses of marshals, United States courts, $350,000.

That is a deficiency, but not as startling as any of the deficiencies which the Senate committee has added to the bill. The Senator from New Hampshire asks me why we propose to appropriate for fees of United States district attorneys $101,000, which is not one-third as much as that appropriation. Then we appropriate for special compensation to United States district attorneys, $10,000; for regular assistants to United States district attorneys, $21,000; for special assistants to United States district attorneys, $30,000; for fees of clerks, United States courts, $116,000; for fees of commissioners, United States courts, $187,200, and for rent of court rooms, United States courts, $42,000. The Senator will see that the other House made provision for fees and expenses of marshals, United States courts, $350,000. Why was that large expenditure? It was because in the last Congress the amount estimated for the fiscal year 1894 was not appropriated and this amount is within the estimates of the appropriations for that object. Then we come to fees of jurors.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Before the chairman of the committee leaves that point, may I ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. This is an urgent deficiency bill, I understand.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There are appropriations in the bill under the head of "district attorneys" on pages 7 and 8, for fees of United States district attorneys, $101,000; for special compensation to United States district attorneys, $10,000; for regular assistants to United States district attorneys, $21,000; for special assistants to United States district attorneys, $30,000. Are those appropriations to pay something in the future or to pay for services already rendered?

Mr. COCKRELL. They are to pay for services for the present fiscal year, up to the close of it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Services already rendered?

Mr. COCKRELL. Services already rendered and to be rendered during the remainder of the year.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. To be rendered up until the 30th day of June next?

Mr. COCKRELL. Up to the 30th day of June next. In further explanation I will say that the other House has appropriated $50,000 for fees of jurors. That is within the amount estimated for in the estimates for the fiscal year 1894, but the appropriation was not made by the House. Now, we come to fees of witnesses. There are $200,000 appropriated by the House in the bill for that purpose. That is within the amount that was estimated for in the estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1894, but it was not appropriated by the House in the last Congress.

Mr. MANDERSON. I wish to ask a question, if the Senator will permit me. I see that there are appropriated here for fees of marshals, jurors, and witnesses $600,000. That is the total of the three items. Are we to understand that in the appropriation bill for the running of courts for the present fiscal year there was no money appropriated?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, there was money appropriated.

Mr. MANDERSON. Can the Senator give us the amount of that appropriation? How much was the appropriation for the present fiscal year? It is $600,000 short. How much was the amount appropriated for those three items?

Mr. COCKRELL. The amount appropriated for 1894 was $600,000.

Mr. MANDERSON. So this will make $1,200,000 for the three items—marshals, jurors, and witnesses?

Mr. COCKRELL. They were different estimates. There was appropriated for the marshals $575,000; for the fees of jurors, $600,000, and for the fees of witnesses, $750,000. Those are the amounts appropriated, and these are in addition to those sums. It is the same way precisely with the items for the United States attorneys and district attorneys. These amounts were all estimated for. Every one of these items was covered by the estimates for the fiscal year 1894. The last Congress did not make the appropriation up to the amount of the estimates; and the estimates, it seems, were nearly correct, and the deficiency has to be appropriated for.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Missouri to state that these deficiency appropriations barely come up to the estimates for the year 1894.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is not a solitary item here that goes over the estimates that were made for the fiscal year 1894.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply want to impress the fact, then, that by the appropriation bill which passed Congress in 1893 making the appropriations for expenses of United States courts, confined to three items of marshals, jurors, and witnesses, there was appropriated $2,025,000, and that now there is found to be a shortage of $600,000, which will make the full appropriation for courts $2,625,000 for these three items. So, in fact, the appropriation made in 1893 was an appropriation for three-fourths of a year instead of the full year, and it is by that practice that somewhere else the country is led to believe that appropriations had been reduced over appropriations made by former Congresses. What I desire is simply to emphasize the fact, so that nobody may be deceived by it, that this pretended reduction in appropriation bills is one that has the unpleasant sequence to it that we come in thereafter with urgent deficiency bills that increase the amount beyond that of former years.

Mr. STEWART. This is a very large amount. The total deficiency under the head of "Expenses, United States courts," as I figure it, is $1,380,000. The Appropriation Committee ought to have come nearer the ordinary court expenses of the Government in making the appropriations than $1,380,000. That shows, it seems to me, a very strange mode of conducting business.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator from Nevada know why the Senate Appropriation Committee of the last Congress did not insist upon the full appropriation and make the bill truly an appropriation for a year instead of, as it should have been entitled, an appropriation for three-quarters of a year?

Mr. STEWART. I have no information on the subject. I merely say this amount is so very large——

Mr. CHANDLER. Was not the Senator a member of the committee?

Mr. STEWART. I was a member of the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. A distinguished lawyer, alive to the necessities of the United States courts, did he allow this omission to go unrebuked?

Mr. STEWART. I supposed we were making appropriations to cover the running expenses. I do not think that the Senate committee added much if anything to the House appropriation, but I supposed the sum required would be figured closer than that. My recollection is not very distinct as to the bill last year. I think the Senate passed the appropriation about as it came from the House, but I was not aware that so large a mistake had been made.

Mr. CHANDLER. What has been the intention or the practice of the Senate Committee on Appropriations when a bill has come from the House making appropriations for three-quarters or two-thirds of a year—a deliberate cutting down of the estimates which the Executive Departments have made, giving the amounts which they have insisted upon would be necessary properly to carry on the Government for the whole year? Have the Senate committee intended to acquiesce in this deceptive system of appropriations, or have they intended to insist upon it that the appropriations shall be brought up in the Senate until they reach the amounts necessary for the full year?

Mr. COCKRELL rose.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask not the Senator from Missouri, but the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I think it was the intention of the committee while I was a member of it to bring up the appropriations as near the actual expenses as possible. That was the effort on the part of the Senate committee so far as I know.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why was it not done in this case?

Mr. STEWART. I am sure I did not anticipate that anything would pass through where it would leave as large a deficiency as this. It rather surprised me, and that is why I made the remark I did.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will just refresh his memory, he will remember how the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], explained time and again that the appropriation bills did not cover the amount of the estimates, and in his judgment appropriations would have to be made to cover the estimates. We do the best we can on the Appropriation Committee—we have done it in preceding Congresses and will do it hereafter—to make an appropriation sufficient to cover the service; but somebody will not accede to that; we can not force it; and when the bill is passed and the full appropriation is not made, it comes in in a deficiency bill. That is all there is about it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose the Senator from Missouri considers the practice that has prevailed as a vicious one, and now we have no remedy. We must acquiesce in the lamentable fact that a system has prevailed of appropriations made in the House of Representatives entirely inadequate to the necessities of the Government for the fiscal year. Attempts have been made by the Senate to increase the amounts, which have been only partially successful; and now we are confronted with the necessity of voting for these enormous sums in repeated deficiency bills. Now that a change has been made in the political character of all the branches of the Government, that the millenium has arrived and the era of reform has come, I sincerely hope that the Senator from Missouri, with his accustomed ability and energy, will see to it that for the next fiscal year the appropriation bills shall carry a sufficient amount to conduct the Government not for nine months, but for twelve months.

Mr. President, when the fortifications bill comes before the Senate I shall have occasion to renew this discussion, because I think we shall find in the fortifications appropriation bill as it has come from the other House that the same vice of which we have been speaking is continued, and that there has been a deliberate appropriation of from two-thirds to three-quarters of the money that it has been estimated by the Executive Departments will be absolutely necessary to carry on the Government for the next fiscal year.

I certainly hope that the Senator from Missouri, the whole of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and the Senate itself will insist upon it that this kind of fraud upon the people of the country shall come forever to an end. I do not undertake now to apportion the blame for this system between the two political parties.

If I should undertake to blame the one party more than the other, if I should undertake to blame the Democratic party more than the Republican party, I know I should draw upon the Senate a long address from the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], a member of the Committee on Appropriations, in vindication of the policy of his party, which I regret to say there is not time for the Senate to listen to to-night. I shall not undertake to blame either political party, but I say it is time that there should be courage enough in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States to deal honestly with the American people when political campaigns are approaching by telling the people exactly how much money will be needed to carry on the Government during the current fiscal year, and not go into those political campaigns with lying appropriations, and with the full knowledge on all hands that the appropriation bills are not appropriation bills for the whole fiscal year, but are appropriations only for three-quarters of the year, and must be followed up during the session of Congress which succeeds the election by large deficiency appropriations, which come in here one after another to the utter discredit of the whole system upon which appropriation bills are constructed and reported and passed in Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. Have any lying appropriation bills been passed heretofore to the Senator's knowledge?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. ALLEN. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to say that it was the custom to pass lying appropriation bills for the purpose of deceiving the people of the country. I should like to know to what extent that custom has prevailed heretofore?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it has always been done when there has been a Democratic House of Representatives. There has been a Democratic House of Representatives in this country now for twenty years, with two exceptions.

Mr. ALLEN. Has it ever been done under a Republican Administration?

Mr. CHANDLER. There have been but two Congresses in which the House of Representatives, as the Senator knows very well, has been Republican since 1874.

Mr. ALLEN. Have any bills of that character been passed during that time?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think certainly there were such bills passed during those two Congresses, and that is why we are having a Populist party growing up in this country. Neither party is wholly to blame for this system of appropriations. We might say, if the Republicans have had the House of Representatives four years in twenty, the proportion is four-twentieths to sixteen-twentieths and because this system has prevailed as to the two old parties is possibly one reason for the rapid growth of the party to which the Senator from Nebraska belongs, who, I am happy to see, divides his time pretty impartially between the other side of the Chamber and this side of the Chamber, and we are always glad to see him on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me?

Mr. CHANDLER. I had entirely forgotten my friend, the Populist Senator from Nevada, who so recently announced the transfer of his political allegiance; and I am glad to welcome him into this field of reform.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Is the fact that the two old parties have become so corrupt that they even pass lying appropriation bills an argument why there should not be a third party?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly the mistakes which the old parties have made form a legitimate argument for the construction of a new party and for the appearance in the Senate of the Senator from Nebraska as a great reform leader. I welcome, as I said, the Senator from Nebraska to that field, and we expect great things from him when he gets fairly settled into the Senatorial harness.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to have an answer from the Senator to another question, with his permission. Does he not believe that the passage of lying appropriation bills by both the Republican and the Democratic parties, as well as other high crimes and misdemeanors committed by them, fully justify the existence of a new political party in this country?

Mr. CHANDLER. I make merely this admission: I think it fully justifies the Senator's election to the Senate and the conversion of the Senator from Nevada from the Republican party to the Populist party. That is as far as I am willing to admit the two old parties deserve affliction on account of their past delinquencies. To that extent I am willing to go.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Does the Senator think that is an agreeable affliction?

Mr. CHANDLER. So far as we are concerned here it is an entirely agreeable incursion into the Senate. I certainly welcomed the Senator from Nebraska when he came here. I did not part without great regrets with the Senator from Nevada. I think it would have been better for him if he had retained his old political affiliation.

Now, Mr. President, I will make no further admissions tonight, because the day is passing; but until this appropriation bill comes up again I shall take into careful consideration the inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska, and if I think that the two old parties have deserved any worse infliction than they have already received through the Populist party, I will frankly say so to him in some future discussion. I have to say to the Senator that I always desire to be frank and keep nothing back, and if I come to a conclusion that would gratify him on this subject, I will make the admission candidly and frankly on some future occasion.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator will know better the deserts of his party after awhile. It will be on trial now for awhile. It may be that they will get something that will not be as agreeable as what has occurred if they keep on in their iniquitous ways.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, inserting lines 22 and 23, on page 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 7, after line 23, to insert:

For special compensation to United States district attorneys, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 8, to insert:

For regular assistants to United States district attorneys, $21,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 2, to insert:

For special assistants to United States district attorneys, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 4, to insert:

Fees of clerks: For fees of clerks, United States courts, $116,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 6, to insert:

Fees of commissioners: for fees of commissioners, United States courts, $187,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 9, to insert:

Rent of court rooms: For rent of court rooms, United States courts, $42,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri whether he understands that these appropriations will be entirely sufficient to carry the Department of Justice through the present year?

Mr. COCKRELL. They are sufficient. They cover the estimates, and are within them, for the remainder of the fiscal year.

Mr. CHANDLER. They are the complete amount of the original estimates?

Mr. COCKRELL. They are within the estimates.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 9, after line 2, to insert:

SENATE.

For compensation of officers, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate, $13,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 5, under the heading "Senate," to insert:

For materials for folding, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 6, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay to Sarah B. Colquitt, widow of the Honorable Alfred H. Colquitt, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Georgia, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 10, to insert:

CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

For expenses of compiling, preparing, and indexing Congressional Directory for the second session of the Fifty-third Congress, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "House of Representatives" on page 9, after line 17, to insert:

For compensation and mileage of Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from Territories, $14,234.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee why we are to put in the Senate an appropriation for compensation of members of the House if the House does not ask for it?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state very frankly that it was done because the Committee on Appropriations of the House requested us to put it in. It was omitted by an oversight in the bill there and they requested it specially. It has always been a custom of the Senate committee that whenever the committee of the House come and make a request of this kind we have complied with it. It has been done repeatedly.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire whether it has been the custom of the House committee to do it when the committee of the Senate makes a request of that kind in the same way?

Mr. COCKRELL. We do not originate the appropriation bills.

Mr. HOAR. I know; but that does not make any difference.

Mr. COCKRELL. But if anything is brought up in committee of conference that was overlooked, and we request that it be inserted, I think the House has always complied in regard to a matter concerning the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. That has not been my observation.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think now the House show us the same courtesy we show them. They have been disposed to do so for some little while.

Mr. HOAR. That has not always been the case, as the Senator knows very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know; but I think we had that matter settled in the beginning of the session.

Mr. HOAR. While the Senator is on his feet I wish he would state, if he has it in his memory, the entire aggregate of the estimates for the next year.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator refers to the next fiscal year?

Mr. HOAR. I refer to the next fiscal year. It is not in reference to this one thing, but I should like to have that for my own information. It has been stated once or twice in the discussion of the tariff bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. As we have it here it is $395,232,109.93.

Mr. HOAR. Without pensions or including pensions?

Mr. CCCKRELL. That does not include the permanent appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. How much are they?

Mr. COCKRELL. The permanent and indefinite appropriations are estimated at $101,074,680.

Mr. HOAR. So that the estimates of the present Administration are about $500,000,000. Do those two items include the whole amount?

Mr. COCKRELL. It comes to something like $496,306,000.

Mr. HOAR. Then if we have any deficiency bills, I am afraid we shall get a billion-dollar Congress, if we do not look out.

Mr. COCKRELL. That may be. I can not tell yet.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 10, to insert as a new section at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. 2. That the act entitled "An act to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes relating to contracts for supplies in the Departments at Washington," approved January 27, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the provisions thereof shall apply only to advertisements for proposals for fuel, ice, stationery, and other miscellaneous supplies to be purchased at Washington for the use of the Executive Departments and other Government establishments therein named; and all advertisements made and contracts awarded or to be awarded thereon since January 27, 1894, in accordance with the laws in force prior to said date, are hereby declared to be legal and valid.

Mr. MANDERSON. It seem to me that is a practical repeal.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all. The Senator will understand it. The law to which this is an amendment intended to confine its operations to the Executive Departments in Washington and to the materials that they bought here in Washington; but the accounting officers of the Treasury have construed it differently; they say it embraces all the bids throughout the whole country. This is simply to limit the law to what it was originally intended to be.

Mr. HOAR. What is it?

Mr. COCKRELL. The bids for supplies.

Mr. HOAR. I know; but what is the provision of the act referred to?

Mr. COCKRELL. The law to which this is an amendment was intended to require all the notices of bids for supplies to be furnished here in Washington to be published by all the Departments at the same time, and the bids to be opened on the same day, etc. The Treasury Department now construes that law to mean the advertisement for all the bids throughout the country, for Indian supplies, Army supplies, and everything of that kind, which was never intended; and they have gone on and advertised through the country for the supplies, and have received the bids. That is the reason why the last clause is put in, to confirm the bids. The section is in the form suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury. I think it was a misconstruction of the law. I do not think the law was ever intended to be construed the way it was.

Mr. HAWLEY. Has the attention of the Senator been called to the contract for stamped envelopes for the Post-Office Department?

Mr. COCKRELL. There are a large number of different bids of that kind.

Mr. HAWLEY. Bids have been made for stamped envelopes for four years, but the Department discover this technical question and the awarding of that contract has been suspended. Will the adoption of this amendment relieve them from the embarrassment.

Mr. COCKRELL. The last clause of the section reads:

And all advertisements made and contracts awarded or to be awarded thereon since January 27, 1894, in accordance with the laws in force prior to said date, are hereby declared to be legal and valid.

That confirms everything.

Mr. HAWLEY. If it confirms what has been done, if it confirms the advertisement for stamped envelopes, it will change very much that business, for that usually has been done under a four years contract, and they will now do it differently.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know as to the exact terms of the advertisements. It will make valid whatever they have done.

Mr. HAWLEY. They have not actually awarded the contract.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then it will depend upon whether they do award it or not.

Mr. HAWLEY. They are waiting for an affirmation of the construction the Senator speaks of.

Mr. GORMAN. When the recent act was passed, and it is a recent act, having been passed in January, 1894, the draft of the bill coming from the Treasury Department, the officers of the Department went on with nearly all the purchases outside of the city of Washington, as under the old law.

Mr. HAWLEY. They did advertise as under the old law, but now the bids being in they are met by this construction. I understand the Postmaster-General does not know precisely what he ought to do.

Mr. BRICE. This validates the advertisements?

Mr. GORMAN. That is all.

Mr. COCKRELL. And it will leave the Postmaster-General perfectly free to go on and complete the contracts just as he would have done if the law had never been misconstrued.

Mr. HAWLEY. He will have to advertise over again?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; everything that has been done is declared valid, just as if the law had never been misconstrued.

Mr. HAWLEY. So he will then make his awards just as he would have done under the old law?

Mr. COCKRELL. Precisely.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not make that motion. It will only take us a few moments to pass this bill.

Mr. QUAY. I do not think the Senator from Missouri can make much further progress with the bill to-night. However, if he expects a final vote upon the bill I withdraw the motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the motion will not be made. I do not think, when we have spent just an hour now and spent an hour this morning and this is the last amendment, that it is fair treatment. I say that very frankly. I hope the motion will not be pressed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to say that there is one amendment at least——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw the motion?

Mr. QUAY. I withdraw it for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Nebraska to make a statement.

Mr. MANDERSON. There is one amendment at least that I intend to propose to the bill, an amendment having reference to the census reports. I do not think that we can be charged with evincing any disposition to delay matters. Here is a bill that runs, I should think, at a rough estimate, into $3,000,000. It must involve about that sum. What is the amount involved in the bill, I ask the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COCKRELL. One million seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MANDERSON. I thought it was more than that, for it runs to over $1,000,000 for courts alone—$1,300.000, I think. I believe the bill should be rather carefully considered, and by a full Senate. Of course it is very easy, if we desire so to do, to insist upon a voting quorum to pass the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator from Nebraska desires to discuss the question further in regard to the census, as a matter of course I will yield. I supposed he had probably seen some of these letters.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is what I want to do. I want to prepare an amendment to the census portion of the bill, and I think by to-morrow morning, with a full Senate, we can conclude it very speedily.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection, then, to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I shall call up the bill in the morning immediately after the routine business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SQUIRE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GORMAN and others. Oh, no.

Mr. SQUIRE. There is only one matter to be considered, and we can dispose of it in a few moments.

Mr. HARRIS. We might have a short executive session, it seems to me.

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator from Washington desires an executive session, I shall not renew my motion to adjourn.

Mr. SQUIRE. I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 12, 1894, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 11, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SERGEANT-AT-ARMS'S REPORT.

Mr. REED. Before the Chair passes on the question which was postponed for this morning, I desire to call his attention to what was not presented in the last discussion, namely, the dialogue on page 3545 of the RECORD, where the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] says:

Mr. SPRINGER. I will withdraw the motion, then.
Mr. REED. Can it be withdrawn in the present situation?
Mr. SPRINGER. I think so. No action has been taken upon it.

The Speaker having announced that the ayes were 62, the noes none—

The SPEAKER. But the House has just voted upon it.
Mr. SPRINGER. But no quorum voted, and no action was taken.
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can not be withdrawn without consent.

So that the matter has been practically decided by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, from such examination of the question as he could make, in light of the suggestions made on the floor, thinks that where the yeas and nays are ordered directly upon a proposition pending (that is a resolution), that it is not then in the power of the movant to withdraw the resolution. If it were on ordering the previous question, or some matter that was not directly upon the resolution itself, that might or might not present a different question; but where the yeas and nays are ordered directly on the resolution, as in this case, and where a vote was taken or attempted to be taken, it seems to the Chair that unless it was held that this was such a decision as prevented the introducer of the resolution from withdrawing it, that it might create great confusion and establish bad practice. The Chair therefore holds in this case that it is not in the power of the gentleman, without unanimous consent, to withdraw this resolution.

The Chair thinks that is the best disposition to make of it, in view of the orderly transaction of the business of the House.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I would like to have it understood, if such be the opinion of the Chair, that there is no intention to rule that it necessarily comes before the House.

The SPEAKER. That question is not involved in this case, because the gentleman from Maine called it up.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I simply wanted it to go over on that point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine made the point that it could not be withdrawn. The Chair thinks the gentleman's point is well taken.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I understand that. I just simply wanted this statement to go along with the decision.

Mr. REED. If it is necessary to call up the proposition, I wish to do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine calls up the resolution.

Mr. REED. I think so. I should rather have a decision of the Chair that it comes up itself, unless the Chair thinks otherwise, because it seems to me that the decision of Mr. Carlisle covers the ground; and I feel quite confident that that question was repeatedly before the House in the Fifty-first Congress.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please refer to the decision of Mr. Carlisle?

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] read the Digest yesterday. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. DINGLEY. That decision referred not to the right to withdraw a motion, but to the fact of it coming over from day to day.

The SPEAKER. That point is made now by the gentleman's colleague, that this matter comes up of itself.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think that the decision I read covers that point. It was Mr. Carlisle's decision, in the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress. I will turn to it in a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will get the Journal of the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. I know that the reference in the Manual is incorrect. I sent for the Journal and could not find it at that point. There is evidently a misprint in it.

Mr. REED. You will find it on page 4422 of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to say that the reference to the Journal of the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress is incorrect?

Mr. DINGLEY. The reference to the Journal in the Manual is incorrect, but I remember the decision that was made by Mr. Carlisle. His decision was to the effect that a question of privilege like that went over from day to day, and whenever any special matter had been assigned to a particular day, for instance the District of Columbia, that it would not come up of itself on that day, but that it would come up the next day, when the ordinary business was to be considered.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Was that not where the previous question had been ordered?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not know whether that was involved. Nothing was said about the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. REED. The House has divided on the question, and that of itself ought to control the matter. You can not have an incompleted division. Just think of it for a moment. You stop all interruptions in a roll call, simply because you can not have an incomplete division. The idea that it could be interrupted by an adjournment would lead to very strange results.

Here is a question partly decided and partly not decided when the House has undertaken to decide it. The situation here is really a great advance upon the previous question. The previous question only orders that all other matters be laid aside and this one be disposed of; but here is a matter that has got beyond the previous question and is half resolved already. It can not be debated, and there can not be anything done with it except to go on and dispose of it. Of course it must come up at once.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to submit a suggestion on this point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. It would seem that at a given point in a discussion, or in settling a question, the House can not proceed to a vote if anyone objects unless the House itself determines to vote by ordering the previous question. Now, when we enter upon a vote without the previous question being actually ordered, then, as the gentleman from Maine has said, we go on by unanimous consent that the previous question is understood to have been ordered. That is so in every case. Therefore, the moment that we enter upon a roll call and are proceeding with a call, we are in precisely the same position that we would be in had the previous question been directly ordered; that is, we have, by unanimous consent, entered upon doing the thing that we are doing exactly as if the previous question had been ordered upon it. I think that is the universal parliamentary law.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I call the attention of the Chair to an extract from Jefferson's Manual, found on page 163 of the Digest, which I read:

When a question is interrupted by a vote of adjournment it is thereby removed from before the House, and does not stand ipso facto before them at their next meeting, but must come forward in the usual way. So when it is interrupted by the order of the day. Such other privileged questions also as dispose of the main question (e. g., the previous question, postponement, or commitment) remove it from before the House.

It would seem that that statement of parliamentary law is applicable in this case, and it is to the effect that this matter does not come up unless it be called up. This report, or this motion upon the report, having been interrupted by an adjournment, does not come up again until such business is again in order and until it is called up.

Mr. REED. That is not a case of a division of the House. A division is a totally different thing. The House was in the act of dividing on this question when it adjourned. The House is in the midst of a roll call—a division—and there can not be any other result than to go on at once and finish that division. The case is even more pressing than where the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman states the case very strongly when he says "in the midst of a roll call—a division." A roll call had been taken and the result announced.

Mr. REED. But we were dividing. Suppose that instead of adjourning we had been able to produce a quorum? Nothing would have been in order except to go right on with that matter.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Then it would have been disposed of.

Mr. REED. But nothing else could have been taken up until it was disposed of. Now, adjournment can not make any difference.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Well, that is an assertion and nothing more.

The SPEAKER. The decision of Mr. Speaker Carlisle, if correctly reported in the Digest, seems to cover the question:

Where the yeas and nays are ordered and taken on a pending proposition and no quorum appears, the order of the House for the yeas and nays remains in force until reconsidered; and should the House adjourn without disposing of such pending question, it would come up after the reading of the Journal on the following day.

That seems to be this exact situation. The Chair has not found the decision in the Journal, because the reference given seems to be incorrect, but if the decision is correctly stated in the Digest, it covers this case exactly.

Mr. DINGLEY. Probably the reference is to the page of the RECORD instead of to the Journal.

The SPEAKER. No. The decision is not found at that page of the RECORD. There has evidently been a mistake in citing the page of the Journal. Although this decision is contrary to the impression which the Chair had as to what had been the practice, the Chair accepts it as a correct statement of the practice which has been established, and will act upon it.

NORTH AMERICAN COMMERCIAL COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. Unless the regular order is demanded at once the Chair will clear the table.

There being no objection,

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the papers in the claim of the North American Commercial Company for transportation and subsistence afforded the surviving officers and crew of the whaling bark Sea Ranger, wrecked at Kyah Islands, May 26, 1893; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE OVER MONONGAHELA RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5356) to authorize the West Braddock Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the Monongahela River from the borough of Rankin to Mifflin Township.

Mr. DALZELL. I move that the House concur in these amendments.

The amendments were read, as follows:

On page 2, in section 4, line 11, after the word "bridges," insert "in the vicinity."

On page 2, in section 4, line 15, after "built," insert "provided that the channel span of said bridge shall be in length not less than 400 feet in the clear."

On page 4, line 4, strike out "hereof," and insert "of the approval of this act."

There being no objection, the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

COMPENDIUM OF COINAGE LAWS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following resolution of the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 6,000 additional copies of the fourth edition of the document entitled "Coinage Laws of the United States, 1792 to 1894," prepared under the direction of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, with the appendix and an index to the same; of which number 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HARRIS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

SUMMONING OF ABSENT MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] respecting the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms. The motion of the gentleman was to discharge the order of arrest; and on that motion the yeas and nays were ordered. The question is upon agreeing to the motion.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vacated.

Mr. REED. I object.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 5, not voting 206; as follows:

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my vote recorded.

Mr. COCKRAN. I did not. I was in the Hall during the roll call, but could not say positively—for I was out in the corridor for a few moments—that I was here when my name was reached.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not entertain the request unless the gentleman was present and failed to hear his name.

Mr. COCKRAN. I cannot say that I was present, although I was sitting here almost entirely through the roll call. I was here substantially during the entire call. But I ask unanimous consent to record my vote.

The SPEAKER. The rule does not permit the Chair to entertain a request for unanimous consent.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to add to the bill as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. That the act entitled "An act to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes relating to contracts for supplies in the Departments at Washington," approved January 27, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the provisions thereof shall apply only to advertisements for proposals for fuel, ice, stationery, and other miscellaneous supplies to be purchased at Washington for the use of the Executive Departments and other Government establishments therein named; and all advertisements made and contracts awarded or to be awarded thereon since January 27, 1894, in accordance with the laws in force prior to said date, are hereby declared to be legal and valid.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Missouri will make an explanation of this section which will justify its incorporation in the bill. I do not understand either the necessity of it or the wisdom of repealing section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, which forbids making purchases and contracts for supplies or services, except for personal services, unless after due advertisements therefor. The law was put upon the statute book in 1861, and has remained unaltered ever since. I do not understand that there was any good reason for changing the construction of the law.

Moreover, if the law is to be changed, I certainly should object to making valid by statute any contracts which have been made or which may be made in nonpursuance of the statute. That I conceive to be a most remarkable provision to introduce into any statute. It is a statutory affirmance of the validity of certain contracts with no list of the contracts, so far as I know; with no explanation of what the contracts are that we are by statute to make and to fasten upon the Government. I may be speaking in ignorance of some list of these contracts which may have been submitted to the Senate. I have not, however, read anything in any report made to the Senate by the committee which gives us a list of the contracts which the committee want to make binding law, whether they are now lawful or not, by this amendment to a deficiency appropriation bill. If the Senator from Missouri or any other member of the committee can state what these contracts are and can show that they are wise and judicious, it may be possible that a reason can be given why we should undertake to make them valid or add something that is lacking of validity to them by statute; but as I now read the last clause of the section, it is a most singular provision to put into any law proposed for adoption by Congress.

And all advertisements made and contracts awarded, or to be awarded thereon since January 27, 1894, in accordance with the laws in force prior to said date, are hereby declared to be legal and valid.

If they are valid now, there is no need of this provision. If they are illegal now, I submit that if we are to go to making contracts valid we ought to know what those contracts are. I do not think the committee ought to ask us to make valid by specific law any contracts unless we know what those contracts are.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I confess that I am very greatly disappointed. We all know the diligence and care with which the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire always listens to all the discussions in which he is a participant. Yesterday evening after 5 o'clock we had this question up. It was discussed fully; the character of the contracts was explained fully; particularly one of them was explained by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and now the Senator says that this is a provision repealing the law which requires advertisements.

I will explain it again, as I did yesterday evening. It is the simplest proposition in the world. Here is the law of January 27, 1894, which was enacted for the express purpose of requiring all the Departments here in Washington, in advertising for proposals for supplies, to advertise that all proposals should be received on one day for all the Departments, and then they were all to be opened and the bids for supplies for each Department were to be accepted, so that there would be a uniformity in price for the various articles needed for the Executive Departments here. It was found that one Department was paying 10, 20, or even 30 per cent more for certain articles than another Department was paying, and there was a diversity of prices.

When that bill was reported nobody anticipated that it would be applied to the advertisements for purchases of supplies for the various branches of the public service outside of the limits of Washington City, such as the proposal for printing stamped envelopes for the Government, such as the proposal for Indian supplies to be furnished at certain other places, and all the various materials that the Government has to purchase for its service beyond the confines of the Executive Departments here. But when the bill became a law the Treasury officials decided that it was applicable to all advertisements for all kinds of supplies in the entire service.

Now, that was a new thing to the heads of Departments. The Post-Office Department and other Departments had gone on and advertised for proposals; the proposals had been received, and some of the contracts had been awarded; some were about to be awarded and some of the advertisements were pending. This amendment simply proposes to amend the law of January 27, 1894—not to change the law whatever in regard to advertisements—so as to leave the old law operative outside of the Departments at Washington; that is all. It only makes binding and valid these proceedings, which, if the intent of the law of January 27, 1894, had been carried out, would be valid. It simply confirms them in order that there may be no difficulty in the adjustment at the Treasury. The advertisements will have to be made in accordance with the existing law; the old law to which the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire refers. The amendment does not repeal that law; it simply prevents the law of January 27, 1894, from amending and changing the old law. It is a matter of very great convenience to all of the Executive Departments that the amendment should be made just as it has been reported by the committee.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, the explanation made by the Senator from Missouri, in charge of the bill, is, I think, extremely lucid and certainly satisfactory. I can see very readily how contracts and advertisements may have been made under this construction of the law, which perhaps is not a misconstruction, for maybe the law was lamely worded in the first instance, and should have correction; but I think it would be a matter of satisfaction if the Senator would give us some idea of the extent of the contracts, which are hung up in the air, which would be validated by this action.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no idea about that. They are just the ordinary advertisements which have been made from time to time. I suppose one of the principal difficulties is about the contract that the Senator referred to in the Post-Office Department, and some others for the supplies of the various Departments.

Mr. MANDERSON. Indian supplies probably.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think Indian supplies, although they may be included. I am not sure about that.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think so.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that probably the Indian supplies and others may be included. The section refers to the regular annual supplies which had been advertised for at the time.

Mr. HAWLEY. The advertisements for bids for stamped envelopes invited a contract for four years. The act of January 27, 1894, would change that contract very much, and make it a contract for a single year. That contract will amount to $600,000 or $700,000; I think $600,000 is a low estimate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senator from Missouri for not having heard the prior explanation of this section, which I understood him to say he made to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. In this connection I take occasion to say that I have noticed many colloquies on the floor between two or three Senators which could not be heard by other Senators who had the misfortune to sit in the wings of the Senate and not in the body or front of the Senate, which may have been entirely satisfactory to the Senators engaged in the colloquies, but which afford no foundation whatever for safe and judicious votes for other Senators to give, and which did not remove from those other Senators the responsibility of arraigning and criticising to some extent bills reported here, especially amendments to House appropriation bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Notwithstanding the explanation of the Senator from Missouri, I am unwilling myself to vote to declare to be legal and valid any contracts whatever unless I know what those contracts are. The Senator from Missouri knows nothing about them. The declaration which he proposes is not a mere declaration that no advertisement shall be deemed to be legal and valid, but it is a declaration that all contracts made shall be legal and valid.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Senator's remedy goes much further than he ought to ask us to go, and I therefore inquire of the Senator whether the purpose which he seeks to accomplish will not be reached by the amendment which I shall move as follows: In line 19, before the word "advertisements," strike out the word "all" and insert "no;" in the same line, strike out "and," before "contracts," and insert "or;" and in line 22, strike out the concluding words, "are hereby declared to be legal and valid," and insert "shall be declared to be illegal or invalid for noncompliance with said law of January 27, 1894;" making the provision a negative one and not an affirmative one.

Mr. HALE. How would it stand then?

Mr. CHANDLER. Making the provision that no advertisement or contract shall be declared to be illegal and invalid because of failure to comply with the law, but omitting to affirm that all contracts made in pursuance of such advertisements shall be legal and valid

Mr. HALE. How will the clause then read?

Mr. CHANDLER. The clause will then read, beginning at line 19:

> And no advertisements made or contracts awarded or to be awarded thereon since January 27, 1894, in accordance with the laws in force prior to said date, shall be declared to be illegal or invalid for noncompliance with said law of January 27, 1894.

The result which the Senator from Missouri desires to accomplish is the same, and there is no undertaking in that provision to declare the validity of contracts which may hereafter arise to plague the Senate and Congress and the Senator from Missouri; because in such cases it may be pointed out to him that this statute made valid by affirmative law every one of those contracts, no matter what may have been the defects or deficiencies therein.

I hope the Senator will consent to change the form of declaration made in these cases.

Mr. COCKRELL. What would be the effect of that upon the bid for stamped envelopes to which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has referred?

Mr. CHANDLER. It will be a valid contract, even although there has not been a compliance with the law concerning advertisements, provided it is otherwise made in accordance with law; but if the section stands as it now reads, if a contract has been made that is invalid for a dozen other reasons than a failure to comply with the law concerning the advertising, it will be made valid by act of Congress. I submit that the amendment as reported by the committee goes altogether too far for safe legislation.

Mr. COCKRELL. Conceiving that the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire is precisely in legal effect the same as the provision we have already in the bill, and does not change its operation or effect one particle, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not concede the effect to be exactly the same, but I will suggest——

Mr. COCKRELL. I have accepted the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Missouri made a short argument in accepting the amendment, to which I shall reply. I will say to the Senator that if the amendment should not be all he desires in its effect, it will go to conference in the House, being a Senate amendment, and then the Senator can exercise the privilege in conference committee and fix it so as to make it exactly what he wants.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it is all I want. It is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg the Senator not to omit in conference to so fix this clause as to accomplish exactly what he wants and to guard us all against making contracts valid by law which are objectionable in a great many other particulars than because they have not been properly advertised for.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no doubt the amendment will be agreed to by the other House.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator will see that it is made right.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. Does he understand that the effect of his amendment is simply to validate those contracts which otherwise would be invalid by reason of the omission of advertising? I understand that there is more than that to be reached by the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire makes it all right. I do not think there is any doubt in the world but that the amendment will operate practically precisely the same as the other.

So far as these contracts are concerned, there are none of them but what are open, just, and notorious, and this amendment says that they are not illegal and not invalid by reason of noncompliance with the law. By complying, therefore, with the old law they will be valid. The amendment will cover every contract; I think there is no doubt about that, and I accept it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the end of line 9, on page 10, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk, the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] not being in his seat and desiring the amendment to be made. I hope the amendment will be agreed to. It is a very small matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 9, on page 10, it is proposed to add:

Library of Congress: To enable the Librarian of Congress to employ a laborer for the care of the library room containing the law books of the Library of Congress, at the rate of $30 per month, $75.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. If there are no other committee amendments, I move to strike out on page 5, from line 2 to line 15, inclusive.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, it is proposed to strike out the paragraph from line 2 to line 15, inclusive, in the following words:

The Commissioner of Labor in charge of the Eleventh Census is hereby directed to prepare forthwith an abstract giving the state and other totals of the main facts collected at the Eleventh Census, with comparative data, which abstract shall not exceed 250 octavo pages, and shall be printed at the Government Printing Office, and be ready for distribution on or before the 1st day of August next. There shall be printed and bound in cloth of such abstract 100,000 copies, of which 60,000 copies shall be for the use of the members of the House of Representatives; 30,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate; 7,500 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 2,500 copies for the use of the Census Office.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I have moved to strike out this piece of proposed legislation upon the pending appropriation bill because I do not think it is a proper place for any legislation upon this subject, even if such legislation were desirable. I have received this morning a letter from the Commissioner of Labor, now in charge of the Census Office, which I shall read, as it presents the considerations which have urged themselves upon him why this additional expenditure should be incurred. It is dated to-day and addressed to myself, and is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, April 12, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: Noting your remarks last evening in the Senate that you proposed to offer an amendment to-day to strike out or modify the provision in the deficiency bill, 6556, relating to an abstract of the census, I simply have to say that that provision was put into the bill at the urgent request of Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of the House, and approved by the House Committee on Appropriations.

If the provision carries, it does not increase the expense of the census except for press work and paper, for the plates used for the abstract would be utilized for the digest which can not be brought out until the last totals of the census are obtained. The purpose of the House committee was to secure an abstract which should be complete as far as possible by July, so as to have a popular edition of the final conclusions of the census at that time, so far as they have been obtained.

It seems to have been forgotten by those who discuss the apparent delay in the census publications, that the office has published nearly 450 bulletins, comprehending over 6,300 pages, and 12 monographs; so that the chief facts of the census have long since gone forth to the public. The great volumes themselves are simply for the permanent preservation of all the details of the census.

Of the Compendium there are to be by law 50,000 copies. The inclosed copy of an act gives you the provisions of Congress for the publication of the reports.

I am, sincerely,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor in Charge.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate.

I have a very high regard for the wisdom, based upon extended experience, of Commissioner of Labor Wright. As a statistician he stands very high. I wish that in the letter he had given the Senate the benefit of his own views as to the advisability of publishing this abstract. He says in his letter that it is in the bill at the urgent request of Mr. CANNON, of the House of Representatives, and was approved on his, Mr. CANNON'S, urgent request by the Committee on Appropriations. Commissioner Wright carefully abstains, as it seems to me, in his letter from any recommendation that this abstract be published. It is true, he states how it can be published, and makes suggestions as to the limited expenditure that will be incident to its publication; but he does not recommend it, and I do not wonder that he abstained from such recommendation.

Turning to the act which he incloses with his letter, I find that there is to be printed and bound at the Government Printing Office the reports of the Eleventh Census, and they are to be, first, a digest of the leading statistics, not to exceed 200 octavo pages, a digest that shall be less in amount of matter and less in number of pages than the abstract of 250 octavo pages proposed to be published by this bill.

The Commissioner says that the plates which will be used for the abstract which is to be speedily obtained, will be utilized for the digest, and, therefore, there will be no expense except for the presswork and paper. If that is to be the course of procedure, if we are to publish this abstract within a short time, and after a greater length of time simply reproduce it under another name, then I submit that, in addition to this legislation which provides for the printing of the abstract, there should be a repealing clause abolishing the publication of the digest.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator let me say a word there?

Mr. MANDERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Wright says explicitly—and I know the Senator does not wish to misinterpret him or misconstrue him—in his testimony before the Committee of the House of Representatives, which I read last evening, that this abstract will be only a part and parcel of the digest which the law contemplates. The matter will all be put in the digest, and will be that part of the digest which can now be completed. The digest entire can not be completed until the last work of the census is finished, because it must be a digest of the entire census, and this will probably be a fourth or a half of the digest, but no more.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have been in the habit of realizing as an aphorism that the greater included the less. How can it be possible that the digest, which is to contain 200 pages, will include all that there is in the abstract, which is to contain 250 pages, and probably more?

Mr. COCKRELL. Where is there any law requiring the digest to contain only 200 pages?

Mr. MANDERSON. I have just referred to the act. It is the law passed February 23, 1893, which provides that there shall be printed and bound "a digest of the leading statistics, not to exceed 200 octavo pages." That is the law.

Mr. COCKRELL. As a matter of course, the pending bill will change that law, because this provides that the abstract is to contain not exceeding 250 pages.

Mr. MANDERSON. We are publishing the digest of the leading statistics of 200 octavo pages, and no more, 50,000 copies. I take it that that digest, come when it will, will cost probably from 50 to 75 cents per volume to publish. It means, therefore, an expenditure of from $25,000 to $30,000. Then we are to publish in addition a compendium to the extent of 50,000 copies. I sent yesterday afternoon during the discussion for the work which is entitled "a compendium," and there is one-third of it. [Exhibiting.] I suggested yesterday how it had increased its proportions from a single volume, which was contained in the compendium of 1860 and the compendium of 1870, to two octavo volumes in 1880, until it has now assumed these tremendous proportions. Here is volume I of the compendium of the last census. [Exhibiting a large volume.] We are to have three great tomes like that, which are to be a compendium of the Eleventh Census. It seems to me that with this compendium, so immense in its proportions, and with the digest that is to come after awhile, we do not need an abstract. It is urged, however, that it is needed because it is something that can be speedily procured.

The purpose of the House committee was to secure an abstract which should be complete as far as possible by July, so as to have a popular edition of the final conclusions of the census at that time, so far as they had been obtained.

There are to be, I understand, twenty-four quarto volumes that shall constitute the census reports of the Eleventh Census. Of these twenty-four volumes not to exceed three or four have yet been issued, and the other twenty or thereabouts are to come with the coming years, the final volumes probably to reach us after the close of the present century. How can there be an abstract of the final conclusions of the census by July that will be of any great value or importance to the country?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, I do not suppose it is intended that the abstract shall be anything like a condensed statement of the subjects-matter that will be contained in the later volumes. It is intended to be an abstract covering population and some other things of everyday use to the people, not going into the volumes which may be termed to be more of a scientific order; and the material is ready for it. I agree with the Senator somewhat as to the point he makes that both an abstract and a digest will not be needed. If the abstract is provided for I should doubt considerably the great need of the digest when we have the compendium.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think there is no doubt about that proposition. But the Senator from Maine states that this abstract is to be a popular edition, not of the final conclusions, but of the preliminary matter, containing perhaps the statistics to some extent as to population, the statistics as to manufactures, not going into the particular reports; for instance, the report on special classes—on fish and fisheries, on educational and church statistics, pauperism and crime, social statistics, Alaska, Indian, etc. Probably it is not to include any of these particular branches of investigation that are of great value, and the issuance of which speedily is of great importance not only for the satisfaction of a laudable curiosity extant in the country, but for the better understanding by Congress of matters incident to legislation.

If it is the idea simply to obtain speedily for the use of the general public information of the general character described by the Senator from Maine, I submit that it has already been obtained; that it has been issued in advance of Government publication in many cheap forms, in many methods of gratuitous distribution. There is not a live, energetic newspaper in the United States that did not in its issue of an almanac on the 1st day of January, 1891, give to the public for an expenditure perhaps of 10, 15, or 25 cents, the very information that it is proposed to publish in this abstract; and when 1892, 1893, and 1894 came and increased matter could be obtained from the reports of the Census Office, and the files of that office, these publications, so cheap in price, have increased in value. I think that the public demand has been thus supplied, and that it is unnecessary that we should go into this additional expenditure of from $50,000 to $100,000, an expense not warranted, so far as the letter from Commissioner Wright is concerned, by any recommendation of the Commissioner.

Mr. President, I hope that this paragraph will be stricken out. I think with the compendium to be issued during the next two or three years, and with the digest that is to come to us, we do not need an abstract. I do not know where the matter is to stop. Perhaps after the abstract is obtained there will be something else needed in the way of tables, or what not. If the motion to strike out the paragraph should not obtain I shall seek to very materially amend it to the extent of the repeal of that part of the law which provides for the publication of the digest and absolutely requiring that this matter shall be ready for the printer in the office of the Superintendent of the Census by the 1st day of June at least. But I hope the motion to strike out will obtain.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think there will be no objection to letting the paragraph be stricken out. Let the question be put on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, to strike out the paragraph on page 5, from line 2 to line 15, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply desire to suggest that with the extraordinary unanimity of action in the Senate on the motion to strike out I feel well content that the Senate conferees upon the bill, when it gets into conference will succeed in convincing the House conferees that the amendment should obtain.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no doubt the other House will agree to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. ALLEN. Yesterday I had the honor to make an inquiry of the Senator from Missouri upon the subject of the destruction of certain portions of census data.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have some letters here that explain the whole thing, which I shall have printed.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to have that matter explained quite thoroughly before this measure comes to a vote. My information may be entirely incorrect; I do not know how that is; but if any material portion of the data gathered for the census is being destroyed and is not being printed in its proper place in the census bulletins and reports, the country ought to be informed of that fact. It occurs to me that an amendment ought to be attached to the bill which would require the publication of all the data.

I am not in a position to say that anything of that kind has been done, nor am I in a position to say that it has not been done. I have been informed from what I take to be a credible source that work which has been set up, plates which had been made upon material subjects, are absolutely being torn out and destroyed, and that the Interior Department or the Census Bureau refuses to publish the matter. I do not think the Government ought to pay for the publication of a mutilated census report. I think the people of this country have a right to know, and they ought to know, everything to be known with reference to our country, and that the Census Bureau ought not to constitute itself a censor of the matter that is to appear in the census reports. Before any vote is taken upon the pending measure, I for one should like to have this matter fully and thoroughly explained.

Mr. COCKRELL. All I can say is that Col. Carroll D. Wright, who has the reputation of being a truthful, reliable gentleman, says positively that there has been no such mutilation. Now, I can not go there and examine it.

Mr. HAWLEY. What does he say?

Mr. COCKRELL. He says there has been no such mutilation as the Senator from Nebraska refers to. I have the letters here from him, and I have a letter from one man whose record Col. Wright is charged to have mutilated, stating that there has been no mutilation, and that is Mr. S. N. D. North.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have here forty-two pages of Mr. North's report, with a blue pencil memorandum on them, marked "omit." They are right here on my desk.

Mr. COCKRELL. Here is a letter from North in which he says it is entirely right.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand the case precisely. Mr. North was not willing to do it, but thought it best to submit.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from Missouri will be kind enough to put into the RECORD the letters from Col. Wright on this subject, or have them read at the desk before the vote on this measure is taken, so that we may be fully informed as to the truth of the matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall have them published as a separate document.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being House bill 4864.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. PEFFER resumed the speech begun by him on Friday April 6, and after having spoken four hours—

Mr. QUAY (at 5 o'clock p. m.) said: Will the Senator from Kansas permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PEFFER. Not if it is for any purpose that would delay the proceeding. I think we shall probably be here anyway an hour yet, and I can conclude in thirty minutes if the Senate will remain with me that long.

Mr. QUAY. The agreement by unanimous consent was that debate upon the tariff should close at 5 o'clock.

Mr. PEFFER. I shall yield, of course, if it is insisted upon.

Mr. MANDERSON. The unanimous-consent agreement was that the debate upon the pending bill should begin at 1 o'clock and close at 5.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask for the enforcement of that unanimous-consent agreement. I understand from the Senator from Kansas that he himself does not desire to proceed, and it is in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. PEFFER. It is this way, Mr. President: If I were to consult my own comfort and convenience I should prefer to discontinue my remarks and continue them to-morrow; but I have a greater respect for the Senate than I have for myself, and I do not wish to inflict myself upon it hereafter if I may be permitted to proceed now.

Mr. GRAY. The obvious meaning of the unanimous consent as understood, it seems to me, by every one—certainly by myself—was that the bill should be taken up at 1 o'clock, and that the debate should continue until 5 o'clock, unless some one wished to speak after that hour, and then I suppose the rule and courtesies of the Senate would obtain in regard to the individual speaker.

Mr. MANDERSON. That was not the unanimous-consent agreement.

[Mr. PEFFER'S speech will be published entire after it shall have been concluded.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate, and the question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. In line 4, page 8, I move to strike out "thirty thousand" before "dollars" and insert "forty thousand three hundred and forty;" and to insert after line 4, "ten thousand three hundred and forty dollars, of which amount shall be available for deficiencies for the years 1892 and 1893;" so as to make the paragraph read:

For special assistants to United States district attorneys, $40,340, $10,340 of which amount shall be available for deficiencies for the years 1892 and 1893.

I offer this amendment because Executive Document, No. 159, being the regular estimate from the Secretary of the Treasury, makes it in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no objection to the amendment. It was not presented to the committee, and therefore was not incorporated in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for a reservation of the amendment moved by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that amendment be reserved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No other amendment being reserved, the question is on concurring in the remaining amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the reserved amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, beginning at line 2, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out the following paragraph:

The Commissioner of Labor in charge of the Eleventh Census is hereby directed to prepare forthwith an abstract giving the state and other totals of the main facts collected at the Eleventh Census, with comparative data, which abstract shall not exceed 250 octavo pages, and shall be printed at the Government Printing Office, and be ready for distribution on or before the 1st day of August next. There shall be printed and bound in cloth of such abstract 100,300 copies, of which 60,000 copies shall be for the use of the members of the House of Representatives; 30,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate; 7,500 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 2,500 copies for the use of the Census Office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, striking out the paragraph which has just been read.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit an amendment which I ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the bill by inserting, after line 9, on page 10:

To pay the list of judgments of the Court of Claims rendered since March 4, 1893, on which there has been no appeal and the time for appeal has expired, $1,023,212.11.

Mr. GALLINGER. In support of my amendment I hold in my hand a list of judgments of the Court of Claims which have been rendered since the date named in it. These judgments cover various claims of citizens of the United States. The present deficiency bill provides for the payment of certain claims for amounts due officers of the Government, which I take it are of comparatively recent origin. But some of these claims at least are more than thirty years old; and yet they have been submitted to the Court of Claims of the United States and had their validity passed upon, and many of them have been appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States and the mandate of the Supreme Court has issued in their favor.

Some of these claims are amounts due men who have acted as letter-carriers of the United States, and they have not been paid the full amount that was due them. I notice that one claim is for fees as chief supervisor of elections of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, one is for fees as United States commissioner, another for fees as United States clerk of court; again——

Mr. HALE. What document is the Senator reading from?

Mr. GALLINGER. This is a "Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting a list of judgments of Court of Claims since March 4, 1893," and it is dated December 20, 1893.

Mr. HALE. What is the number of the Executive Document?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is Executive Document No. 11. There are claims such as for fees as United States commissioner, fees as United States clerk of court, fees again as United States commissioner, extra pay of a general service messenger of the Army, extra pay of a soldier of the United States Army on certificate of merit; and then other claims for services rendered by humble citizens of the Republic. There is one claim that has been passed upon by the Court of Claims and affirmed by the Supreme Court, by which it appears that we owe the Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan and Indiana $104,626, which amount is due under various treaty stipulations of the United States and has been due for a considerable number of years. Again, there is a claim on the part of a United States clerk of court, another of a United States naval officer, and again another of a United States clerk of court. There is a claim on a contract to furnish beef at the Fort Peck Agency, in Montana.

I presume the beef was consumed a great many years ago. This citizen of the Republic, although the Court of Claims has decided in his favor, and the Supreme Court likewise, if his case was appealed, has affirmed the judgment, is refused payment, it seems, for that food product which he furnished to the Government of the United States. Again, there is a United States commissioner; again, there is a chaplain in the United States Army, who has not been paid for the services he rendered in behalf of the souls of the soldiers of the Republic. There is another letter-carrier who seems to have been defrauded, another clerk of a court, and still another clerk of a court. A citizen of the Republic, the Public Printer, rented buildings. I notice the name of John C. Rives. His administrator brought suit. The Court of Claims says that a certain amount is due him, and the Supreme Court affirms that judgment.

We come here, as we have during the present Congress, with four deficiency bills for the purpose of paying sums that are undoubtedly due citizens of the Republic, but the claims for which are comparatively fresh, and yet we have this document before us, where the Court of Claims has decided and the Supreme Court has affirmed its decision, that the Government owes this money to citizens of the United States. To my knowledge, a friend of mine has a claim in this list that is thirty-two years old. I submit, if we do not include these claims in the pending deficiency bill, we are doing ourselves a wrong, as well as the men in whose behalf I now appeal. I trust that there may be no mistake about this matter, and that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not only see the justice but the urgency of paying these men the amounts that are due. This is all I care to say just now.

Mr. HALE. Let me call the Senator's attention to the large item found at the beginning of the third page. I suggest to him that before moving his amendment he should strike that out, because that would certainly give rise to controversy and prevent favorable action upon his amendment. It is the large sum of $800,000 for the "Old Settlers" or Western Cherokee Indians. I suggest to the Senator that he will disembarrass his amendment if he strikes that out.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to having the amendment modified by reducing the amount, and stating the sum in the amendment exclusive of that claim.

Mr. HALE. Yes, exclusive of that claim.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not see why there should be a distinction made among these judgments.

Mr. GALLINGER. There should not be, as a matter of justice.

Mr. MANDERSON. If one should be paid, surely all should be paid.

Mr. HALE. There is a distinction, I will state to the Senator. Certain claims are of a class that always give rise to controversy, and this is one. It always has done so and always will. It is so large a sum, being nearly a million dollars, that the probable sense of the Senate would be that without investigation by a committee it should not be put on the bill. The others, which are smaller, do not raise that objection. I should think the Senator himself would see the propriety of striking out this large item and taking the question upon the others.

Mr. GALLINGER. While off-hand I suggested that I would be willing to eliminate this claim from the list, I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that not only has this claim been passed upon by the Court of Claims, but that the mandate of the Supreme Court, under date of May 29, 1893, affirms the judgment on that claim. So I think really the Senator from Nebraska is right when he says we ought not to discriminate against a claim that has run the gauntlet of the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court of the United States, and eliminate it from the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I can only say that on this old claim and the class of claims which a great many of us know about, until I had examined the papers and the judgment of the court to see what it covers, and read the mandate, as the Senator calls it, I should not for one be willing to vote for the amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I do not think that any difference in principle can be recognized between these different claims, such as is suggested by the Senator from Maine. If a debt is large there is perhaps the larger reason why it should be paid. Here are a large number of judgments that have upon full investigation of the demands been obtained in the Court of Claims. Why should they not be paid? Why should the United States continue in the position of being as dilatory, not to say as unprincipled and as dishonorable a debtor as there is in the world? Its reputation is so odorous and notorious that even the playwriter harps upon it and bases plays upon the facts, and we have represented upon the stage by great actors the position of the claimant who year after year presents himself appealingly at the doors of Congress and asks that an honest debt shall be paid.

I have heard it stated by some of those who have grown gray in Congressional service that if they had a claim against the Government of the United States which had to undergo the scrutiny and receive the action of Congress, rather than permit their heirs to proceed in an effort at recovery they would destroy every paper connected with the claim; that economy would dictate such a course, that peace of mind would prompt it. It is notorious that year after year and session after session of Congress, because of a fear to appropriate enough money to pay the honest debts of the Government, they are not paid and deserving creditors suffer shame and loss.

No reason can be urged, it seems to me, why a single one of these claims should not be paid, and no reason can be urged why the vast amount of money due the frontiersmen, due the settlers of the Western country for Indian depredation claims, should not be paid. Year after year those claimants appealed to Congress. At last in response, in feeble response to their demands, we organized a court; Indian depredation claims were sent to the court for trial; and although they had become so old under these enforced delays that it was difficult to prove them, they have in many instances been proven and judgments have been obtained. Yet upon no appropriation bill is there a single dollar ever appropriated for the payment of those just claims and in satisfaction of the judgments obtained against the United States. They ought to be paid, in common decency and fair honesty, and I am very glad to see that upon this appropriation bill, an urgent deficiency bill, there is an effort on the part of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to reach even in part this honest and decent result. If I had the matter within my reach, so that I could present it as an amendment to his amendment, I should move to add every Indian depredation claim upon which a judgment has been rendered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not insist upon the amendment. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] made a clear statement in regard to this old Indian claim known as the "Old Settlers'" claim.

Here is an other item for the Pottawatomie Indians in Michigan and in Indiana of $104,626, which, it is said, is under a treaty stipulation. The committee have not had time to examine it so as to see out of what fund it should be paid, or whether it is to come directly out of the Treasury. We know nothing about it. This is simply an estimate. All of these matters belong to the general deficiency appropriation bill which will soon come from the House of Representatives, and upon that bill we shall consider them and investigate all these items.

Here are several items for losses and damages under contract for work in connection with the water supply of the District of Columbia, proposing to make the United States pay. That sum should come out of the treasury of the District of Columbia, and not out of the Treasury of the United States.

There is no urgency about these matters, and when the general deficiency bill comes up they will all be duly considered and be put under the proper headings, so as to come out of the proper fund. The amount of several thousand dollars which ought to be paid by the District of Columbia will not then come out of the Treasury, and the $104,626 will come out of the trust funds which belong to the Indians and be properly designated. The item of $800,386.31 to the "Old Settlers" will come out of moneys due them under treaty stipulations for lands belonging to the m. As the matter stands now it can not be done, and I hope the Senator will not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand the distinguished Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to say that he will insist upon including these claims in the regular deficiency bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I say they belong to the regular deficiency bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. What hope have we that they will be inserted?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have not investigated the claims. I am in favor of paying them, so far as that is concerned, but I am in favor of paying them according to the judgments of the courts and according to law.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] talks about the "Old Settlers" as though they were the old pioneers. They are Indians known as the "Old Settlers" or Western Cherokee Indians. Their claims arise under a treaty with them. I would insert a provision to pay them according to the treaty out of the money and lands due them, and I would put in the other items to be paid out of the proper funds; but I would not put all the claims contained in a document in this way. The Senator from Maine, who is a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the general deficiency bill, will give attention to these matters. The committee always does that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The first man I met whom I knew when I came to the other House of Congress from my State, was a man who had a claim against the Government of the United States. I did not know of it until I met him on Pennsylvania avenue. He explained to me that he had a claim against the Government that was about thirteen years old, for $400. He had been here at every session of Congress, he said, during those thirteen years, and he had spent about three times as much as the amount of the claim in endeavoring to get it adjusted. He had eight or ten different unanimous reports, but he never could get his claim through Congress. I took the matter in hand, and in about six months I succeeded in getting his claim through the other House, and in about three months more it passed the Senate of the United States. He was a very poor man, and when the bill passed and was signed by President Cleveland I spent 25 cents to reach his boarding place, only to learn there that he had died three days before and had been buried by charity in the District of Columbia.

If the Government of the United States, Mr. President, could be treated as a private citizen is treated in regard to its pecuniary obligations to its citizens, it would be in State's prison constantly for larceny.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] truly says that a man who has a claim against the Government of the United States, however just it may be, might better toss it into the Potomac River or into the furnace in his house, rather than to undertake to prosecute it before the Congress of the United States. In my opinion it is a shame and a disgrace that we sit here year after year and allow claims adjudicated, as these claims have been adjudicated, to remain unpaid.

My only desire is to call the attention of the Senate to this matter in the hope that the Committee on Appropriations may either now consent to have these claims included in this deficiency bill, or that they may certainly include them in the next deficiency bill, urgent or otherwise, which may come before the Senate for its consideration.

I am inclined to think that the objection made by the chairman of the committee is well founded. I have no disposition to make the United States pay money which the District of Columbia should pay. I think the United States pays its full share in these matters.

So far as the large Indian claim is concerned, I have a great deal of sympathy with the poor Indians, who have been cheated by this great Government out of nearly a million dollars. The fact that they are Indians is an added reason why I should insist that they should be dealt fairly with and not be defrauded and cheated by a Government which has driven them from pillar to post until now they are almost outcasts in the United States.

In view of the objection which has been urged and the suggestions which have been made by the chairman of the committee calling attention to the fact that these claims can not very well be allowed in lump, and as I have not had time to consider them in detail and am not prepared to offer amendments on each separate item, I will withdraw the amendment, trusting to the generosity and, as we are all glad to testify, to the fair dealing of the distinguished chairman of the committee, that he may himself endeavor to get these claims put into the next deficiency bill that comes before Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. We shall take them up in the general deficiency bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand that the amendment is withdrawn?

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have no amendment to offer, but I propose to put on record now some criticisms as to the management of the census reports. When Mr. Porter left the Census Bureau last year, on the 21st of July, he reported that 328 pages of the report on manufactures were completed and that those 328 pages were stereotyped.

As to the report of Mr. North upon woolen manufactures and upon the whole wool industry, I think it is one of the most valuable reports ever printed, and that Mr. North is one of the most competent men in the country to do such work. He gave great labor to it and took great pride in it, and made what I think is an exceedingly valuable report. I suppose the criticism of Secretary Smith upon the historical portion of the report was as to its length.

In the census of 1860, during Democratic control, there was a report on the condition and the history of the woolen industry from the beginning of the Government to that time. It was a valuable historical sketch, but it was imperfect. The returns were imperfect, difficult to make, and it is almost impossible to make anything like a correct history of that industry, because the censuses taken in early years were themselves very imperfect, the subjects were not sufficiently classified, and perhaps capable men were not always employed.

Mr. North, not at too great length, but I think in a condensed way, has made a very admirable history of the progress of the woolen industry. He does not say anywhere that its condition was owing to good times or bad times when certain changes were made, but that manufactures went down during crises of extraordinary disaster. It is evident to me on reading, not that paper alone, but others, that many of the troubles of our manufacturers during the last seventy-five years were due to a vitiated currency and general catastrophes and calamities which overtake business from time to time without any satisfactory explanation.

I think there was an undue jealousy of Mr. North's report, lest there should be some material in it for a protective argument. At the close of this historical sketch the following paragraph has been eliminated:

> We find the domestic wool manufacture in 1890, in the point of development, where it is fairly comparable with that of European countries. It is exceeded by that of Great Britain in the quantity of wool consumed, and probably in the value of product. It exceeds the wool manufacture of France, Germany, and every other continental nation in both particulars. Its advance during the last thirty years has been far more rapid than in any other country. This fact may be demonstrated by a comparison with Great Britain, whose statistics of wool consumption are more accurately compiled than those of any other European nation.
> Before 1860 we imported more woolen goods, in duty-paid value, than we made in our own factories. Our woolen manufacturers consumed but 98,379,785 pounds of greasy wool in that year. In 1890 their consumption had grown to 434,000,000 pounds. In 1869 the British manufacture was consuming 300,000,000 pounds of wool annually, three times as much as our own. In 1890 the British manufacture consumed about 470,000,000 pounds, or but 8 per cent more than our own.
> A change from threefold to only 8 per cent more.
> In these 30 years our manufacturing consumption of wool has increased nearly 340 per cent, while that of Great Britain has grown 57 per cent.

That was not an incidental summary, but a compact history. If that be stricken out, it is because I am really afraid that it does furnish material for a protective argument.

I shall not trouble the Senate with selections from the forty-two or forty-three pages which I have here that have been stricken from the report. The pencil marks on the pages I have here show how the work of elimination has been done.

This was a work completed and approved as much as any work was approved. If it was not approved by any formal record in the Department, it was certainly by the oral approval of the order to go to print by Mr. Porter, and it was approved by Mr. Secretary Noble. I hold in my hand the completed work of the previous Administration.

That is not all, Mr. President. The report upon iron and steel, prepared under the direction of Superintendent Porter by Dr. William M. Sweet, of Philadelphia, one of the most competent men in the country for such work, has been cut and expurgated, and portions showing the development of the industry in comparison with that of other countries, Dr. Sweet has been informed, will be omitted from the report. The special agent of the Census Bureau called on Dr. Sweet within a week to show him the eliminated portions of his report. To this mutilation of his report Dr. Sweet strenuously objected, and is still earnestly protesting against it.

That was a completed work. I do not know what authority Secretary Smith had to take that completed work, after it had been approved by a previous Administration, eliminate and remold it and still leave the name of Dr. Sweet to it, and publish it as the census report collected under the law for that purpose.

I do not know precisely the particulars, but there is fault to be found, in my judgment, in the treatment of the report upon the Indians. The law for the census of 1890, departing a little from the usual path, instructed the officer in charge of that work to report not only the mere figures of the population, industries, etc., but, to use a general phrase, concerning the condition of the Indians. From what I know of the man who did the work, Mr. Donaldson, of Philadelphia, and from what I know of the list of men he employed and the care he took, I believe that is a document of inestimable value, and it should be printed as he wrote it; it is necessary that it should be so printed. If there be any little repetitions in it they should be corrected, but the document as he wrote it would be a historical document, and would be looked back to ten, twenty, thirty, or forty years hence as giving more correctly the status of the Indian at this time than any similar work has ever done. It was accompanied with photographs.

The proposition has been made—I do not know how much has been done—to cut down that work very largely and destroy its usefulness. The criticism made upon that work is that there are quotations in it from the reports of Secretaries of the Interior or Commissioners of Indian Affairs from time to time. So there are, but those quotations are indispensable, as anyone can see in a moment by examining the work for anything like a historical statement or description of the present condition of the Indians.

These are not the only criticisms I might make. I might make many more from the rather imperfect information I have, but those I have stated I believe to be just criticisms upon the conduct of the present Secretary of the Interior in changing work that had been completed by a previous Administration, without sufficient authority, or without any authority.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut whether the report made by Mr. Donaldson has actually been cut and mutilated?

Mr. HAWLEY. I suppose it has been. That is my information.

Mr. MORGAN. Is there any official statement to that effect?

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] knows, perhaps, better than I about that.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that about 400 pages of the final work treating upon the general subject of Indians taxed and not taxed has been or will be eliminated from the work. I might state that this work of Mr. Donaldson, who was the expert special agent, was performed under this authorization of the statute:

> The Superintendent of Census may employ special agents or other means to make an enumeration of all Indians living within the jurisdiction of the United States, with such information as to their condition as may be obtainable, classifying them as to Indians taxed, and Indians not taxed.

Proceeding under that statute, Special Agent Donaldson prepared certain reports—and I have one before me—on the Moqui-Pueblo Indians. These bulletins, some three or four in number, were printed and issued exactly as they were prepared by him.

The only parts of the whole work not yet issued are a report on the Five Civilized Tribes, that I understand is partly printed and in the hands of the printer and the final work, treating generally upon the subject and called Indians Taxed and not Taxed, which is also printed and in the hands of the printer. I understand both these works have been somewhat mutilated or cut by the blue pencil of a reviser.

The manuscript of the work known as the Five Civilized Tribes having been examined by the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of the Senate, was seen by them to be of such very great importance, and it was felt that it contained information so valuable, that that committee before departing for the expedition to the Indian Territory, where they now are, ordered it printed; and that work, without any of the illustrations, has been printed for the use of that committee. I was told by the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Colorado that that work would be of very great value to them in making their explorations of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator is referring to my colleague [Mr. PLATT], who is on the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes; to the colleague of the Senator, and to the Senator from Colorado.

The other work, which has not yet been issued, although partly printed, known as Indians Taxed and Not Taxed, I have examined with great thoroughness. As it was originally written, it was a most valuable publication. It seems to me that it is a very full and at the same time a careful and exact compliance with the law. It gives the condition of these Indians. There is nothing that I can see of surplusage in it, and nothing that ought to be omitted. Much of it, as I say, is already in print in the Printing Office, and if there is to be any revision or cutting down of this final report it will be the elimination of that which is already in type, and much of which, I understand, is already electrotyped in the Public Printing Office.

The value of that work will appear from what I shall read. Dr. Daniel G. Brinton is known, perhaps, to every student of ethnology, and there is no more exact observer of the American Indian than he.

I will read a letter from him on the character of these works addressed to the author:

> PHILADELPHIA, PA., September 12, 1892.
> DEAR SIR: I wish to express to you the very great interest and pleasure I took in examining your final report on the Indian tribes, as shown to me in proof. It is full of the most valuable, because fresh and accurate, information on the native race. I sincerely trust that it will be issued by our Government at an early date, and without omission or diminution. There is nothing in it which can be spared, either by the historian or the scientific student. It furnishes exactly what we so much need—calm, clear, objective information about this race, concerning whom, in spite of centuries of contiguity, we really know so little. It would be difficult to overestimate the value of such work as you present; because, as everyone knows, the opportunity to repeat it at any future census will not exist. The Indian tribes are changing so rapidly in every respect that another decade will forever obliterate many a peculiarity which you have so successfully noted and chronicled.

All that I have said above of the final report is equally true of the bulletin prepared of the Five Civilized Tribes. It is an excellent study of these important nations, and I trust that its contents will soon be available both to scholars and those practically interested in the welfare of these peoples.

In conclusion, I wish to repeat what I have previously expressed to you personally and in scientific journals, that the Census bulletins relating to our Indian population issued by you must always rank among the very best of our first-hand sources of information, and will be referred to as such by all future historians of the aboriginal race of our country.

I am, very truly, yours,

DANIEL G. BRINTON.

Mr. THOMAS DONALDSON.

Mr. Donaldson, who was selected for this work, won his spurs in an exploration and labor akin to this when, years ago, he was selected to compile the treatise on the public lands of the United States. There is no public document, there is none that in the West, at least, has been so largely sought as this four-volume edition showing the history of the public domain of the United States and giving a compilation of the laws and the decisions. It is found in the library of every practicing lawyer in the West who has proper regard for the duties devolving upon him incident to his profession, and I have no question but that there will be a demand very speedily for some supplemental work of the same character and a reprint of the publication to which I refer.

Afterwards Mr. Donaldson issued under the direction, I think, of the Bureau of Ethnology or the Smithsonian Institute a work upon the Indian, which, while small as compared with this later exploration, is also of great value. He is a very exceptional man in his ability to pursue intelligently these subjects, and is recognized among those who are interested in them as perhaps better fitted and qualified for such work than any other man in the country.

Whoever may be disposed to eliminate and use the blue pencil in cutting down this work should do so with great caution, for I do not believe there is any man in the country so well qualified to write upon the subject as this expert, and he who proposes to expurgate or expunge his work should do it with exceeding great care and make haste very slowly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to state merely a single fact and then I shall be done. I want to add to my previous statement that it will be surely found upon examination, I think, that the matter already set up and stereotyped at a cost of from $50,000 to $75,000 has been thrown away by reason of the expurgations to which reference has been made.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to know whether this compilation of historical evidence and examination of facts has been submitted to and approved by the predecessor of Mr. Wright? I do not know how that is. Did Mr. Porter approve of this work?

Mr. HAWLEY. He did. Mr. Porter approved of the woolen report and of the Indian report.

Mr. MORGAN. According to my understanding of the law governing the Departments in matters of that kind, his successor in office has not any right to disapprove it after it becomes a record of the Department.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is what I supposed.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand also that the matter has been printed, or that the printing is nearly completed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I believe it is all stereotyped.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I object very seriously to the cutting out from the Census Report that part of the report which I happen to have looked over with some care—not all of it, but a part of it—and which I consider to be the most creditable part of the entire production so far as I have observed it, especially with regard to the matters of special examinations which are required to be ascertained and reported upon by special agents.

I should with great reluctance reject anything that Mr. Donaldson has done in the way of investigation of the laws or conditions relating to the public lands or the Indians of this country. He, I believe—I think I am correct about that—was the editor of the Catlin collection of the Indian tribes and their historial reminiscences published by the Smithsonian Institution?

Mr. MANDERSON. That is true.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a very great work. There is not a book which has been published by the United States which reflects more credit upon the Government than that, unless it may be the Public Land Laws or the Public Domain, which was gotten up and published by the same gentleman.

So he, having been employed as a special agent, having made his report, and it having been approved by the predecessor of Mr. Wright, I can not imagine anything more improper than for him to thrust his hand here and cut out pages and pages.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if he is aware that Mr. North, the gentleman who prepared the report on wool, stated that the changes were made in it for good reasons, and with his full consent and approval?

Mr. MORGAN. I am not speaking of the wool report. I am speaking of the Indian article.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator was speaking of the other report.

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all. I do not know anything about the wool report. I am speaking of the Indian report.

I think it is a ruthless act to thrust a knife into those pages and cut out any part of what Mr. Donaldson has put there, I do not care whether it be original matter that he himself wrote or whether it has been collected from the reports of different Government officers and agents from time to time and edited by him and thrown together in connection with his own observation, so as to make this narrative complete in its historical character.

As a member of the Committee on Public Lands, I have often had occasion to refer to the book on the Public Domain as a standard work. I do not think there is a Senator who ever looked at it who did not regard it as of the highest authority on the subject of the history and condition of the public lands.

As a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs also, whatever this gentleman has published I have always taken as being the very best exposition possible of the question; and I should feel very reluctant indeed to find that anything had been done to take those contributions out of the census reports.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I will read the following letter:

ROOM 21, MALTBY BUILDING, Washington, D. C., April 6, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the article in the New York Tribune of April 2, 1894, with reference to my report on wool manufactures for the Eleventh Census, I want to say that so far as the article reflects in any way upon you in connection with the revision and publication of that report, it is entirely without foundation. Without referring to anything that occurred respecting the report prior to the date upon which you took charge of the census, I have no possible ground for complaint in the manner of your treatment of me or of the report. On the contrary, I shall always be grateful for the kindly consideration I received at your hands. The report was published in substantially the shape in which I prepared it, except as to the preliminary historical sketch, which was omitted for reasons explained in the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Interior dated October 13, 1893, and with my full consent and approval.

Very respectfully,

S. N. D. NORTH, Special Agent.

Hon. CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Superintendent of Census.

I have another letter, which reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, April 11, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Some remarks were made this morning on the floor of the Senate in the discussion on H. R. 6556, so far as it relates to the Eleventh Census, which would indicate that the facts relating to the publication of the Eleventh Census ought to be in your hands when the bill comes up for further debate.

I have the honor, therefore, to inform you that the publications of the Eleventh Census, consisting of twenty-four quarto volumes, are being brought out in accordance with the act approved February 23, 1893; that they are being brought out in the integrity of the intention of that act, and as originally planned by my predecessor in office. No report is being suppressed; no statements of facts are being changed or in any way mutilated; no plates have been destroyed, and no delay has been allowed in the final preparation of this vast amount of material. Some of the reports have undergone revision under my administration of the Census Office, but only in such a way as to make the reports of far more value to the Congress and to the public. This has been done without the slightest violation of the rights of the authors of the reports and without any violation of the matter reported. One report has been revised to such an extent that the original plates can not be used in full, but they will be used so far as possible and in no case destroyed.

Of the whole twenty-four volumes only three have been published; twenty-one, therefore, remaining to be published. The general clerical work on these twenty-one volumes will be practically finished in June. The remainder of the work will be the completion of parts of three volumes, and the immense amount of proof-reading and revision essential to the integrity of the census.

With respect to the abstract provided for in H. R. 6556, I would say that it is a suggestion of the House, and will be practically the digest provided for in the act to provide for the publication of the Eleventh Census, approved February 23, 1893. The plates for the one can be used for the other; but a complete digest can not be published until the last page of the copy of the census reports is ready. The abstract is to comprehend all that is ready by July 1, and in no way displaces anything else.

Of the Compendium, one volume was issued prior to my taking charge of the census, and the other volumes must be uniform with it; the second is nearly ready.

From these statements you can readily judge of the condition of the publications of the Eleventh Census and of the necessity of the legislation asked for.

I am, very respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in Charge.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

I also take occasion in connection with the same matter to read another letter, which is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, April 6, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: At the hearing on the urgent deficiency bill, in which there are some items relating to the census, which you so courteously accorded me this morning, you made an inquiry relative to some statements which had been made to the effect that the report on Indians was being changed in some way or valuable matter suppressed from it, and the publication of the report delayed.

I know something about that report. I had a long talk with Col. Thomas Donaldson in regard to it, and I have just as much interest in having his report published, without any improper mutilation, as any one else. I know it will be a valuable work, and it was in consequence of the conversation I had with Col. Donaldson that I called on Mr. Wright face to face, to know what he was doing. This letter continues:

I am exceedingly obliged to you for calling my attention to this matter, for it enables me to put you in possession of the facts.

When I took charge of the Census Office, October 6, 1893, I found that the report on the Five Civilized Tribes and the final report upon the Indians were under revision. In order to have the revision systematic, just to the author, Mr. Thomas Donaldson, and the report creditable to the Government, and in order to have all the reports which were left for me to publish conform to the plans laid down by my predecessor, and further to meet the requirements of law under a liberal construction, I issued to the editors of the census general instructions (a copy of which is inclosed, marked "A"), and special instructions relative to the report on Indians (copy inclosed, marked "B"). The necessary revision has delayed the publication of the works in question for the reason that in the final work on Indians there are over 225 pages (printed), or nearly one-quarter of the whole report, taken almost bodily from the reports of the Commissioners of Indian Affairs and others, and I have not felt warranted in putting the Government to the expense of republishing so much matter. Great blocks of this material have been taken from the reports of the Commissioners of Indian Affairs without credit.

The whole work is now practically completed, but it will be indefinitely delayed until a question of copyright is settled. I assure you that no attempt has been made, or will be made, to suppress any of the material facts collected by Mr. Donaldson or his assistants for the purposes of the Eleventh Census. No statements of facts have been or will be changed or altered in any way; but wherever errors appear, such as are found in additions, etc., pains have been taken to secure accurate statements. No violence is being done to Mr. Donaldson's report in any respect. I am simply doing my duty, which is to see that the report is brought out in such a way that the Government shall be assisted and not injured. I may further state that I have every reason to believe that my efforts in the way of the revision of Mr. Donaldson's report have been thoroughly acquiesced in by him, because I notified him at once of the revision and its method, and sent him copies of my letters marked "A" and "B," as inclosed, and I have never as yet, to this day, received a word of objection or protest from him. I can therefore assure you that, so far as the records of this office are concerned, Mr. Donaldson fully acquiesces in the revision that has taken place.

A further matter which causes delay in the publication of Mr. Donaldson's report relates to a claim which has been filed here by Mr. Charles F. Lummis, of San Francisco, the author of several illustrated works on the Indians. A copy of Mr. Lummis's letter or claim is filed herewith, and marked "C." In this the Government is notified that it will be held responsible in damages for the illegal use by Mr. Donaldson of various copyrighted illustrations. Mr. Donaldson has informed me that he can defeat any such claim. I have called upon him to furnish a waiver of the claim of Mr. Lummis or others, and I presume he will furnish this release, but he has not yet done so. I find, upon examining some of the works of Mr. Lummis, that Mr. Donaldson has used illustrations printed therein, and furthermore, that the records of the copyright office of the Government show that Mr. Lummis's claims are valid; but whether the copyrights really belong to Mr. Lummis or not has not yet been settled.

I should be thoroughly derelict in my duty as an officer of the Government if I allowed any work to be issued the publication of which would result in a claim for damages against the Government. This claim for damages for the illegal use of copyrighted matter by Mr. Donaldson will necessarily delay the publication of his report, independent of the delay caused by the revision.

I am happy to inform you that the copyright matter is in the way of speedy settlement, for since dictating the foregoing I have received a letter from Mr. Lummis making a most liberal offer for the release of his claim for damages under the copyright act.

Mr. Donaldson's report on the Five Civilized Tribes is now in the hands of the printer, and proofs of this and of the final report will be forwarded to him as promised.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in Charge.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

Mr. President, I ask that the exhibits referred to in the letter may be printed in connection with it. That is all the information I have on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

The exhibits referred to are as follows:

A.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, October 14, 1893.

SIR: The editors are directed to examine the reports submitted and not beyond revision, with a view to reducing to the lowest consistent limits all matter not strictly growing out of the census. In so far as possible the text should be based upon the tables, and consist only of such a simple analysis as will make the tables clearly intelligible.

The tables should be clear in arrangement and not too minutely attenuated, and the box headings should be distinctive and express clearly the contents in the respective columns.

Especial watchfulness is enjoined in eliminating all personal criticism, criticism of official action, or suggestions to other bureaus and other branches of the Government, and discussion of debatable questions. The Census Report should be a repository of facts.

Matter from other publications is to be excluded where not essential for elucidation of the statistical matter, especially such matter as is already available to the public in other current reports. Due acknowledgment should be secured in every case where it seems necessary to use extracts from other publications.

Your especial attention is called to my letter to the honorable Secretary of the Interior of the 10th instant, and his approval thereof. Also to my letter of the 13th instant, to Mr. Steuart, in charge of the Division of Manufactures.

Very respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in Charge.

Mr. JAMES H. BLODGETT,
Editor in Chief, Eleventh Census.

B.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, October 14, 1893.

SIR: The editors will prepare the material for reports on Indians in conformity with the directions in a general letter of this date, and follow these special directions:

1. Prepare the manuscript on the Five Civilized Tribes for issue as an extra bulletin. The illustrations already printed, forty-five pages, are in possession of this office.

2. Prepare all Indian matter in hand, including the extra bulletins (Six Nations, Eastern Cherokees, Moquis, Five Civilized Tribes) for issue in one volume.

3. For this latter, exclude worthless pictures. The Office has plates for all illustrations except colored lithographs.

4. At the earliest practicable date, the editors will report to the Commissioner of Labor, in charge, on the necessity of a new edition of the colored lithographs to be used in the final report.

Very respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in Charge.

Mr. JAMES H. BLODGETT,
Editor in chief, Eleventh Census.

JANUARY 6, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Upon my return from South America I find here a copy of your "Extra Census Bulletin, Moqui Pueblo Indians of Arizona and Pueblo Indians of New Mexico." I fancy you personally can not be aware of the astoundingly impudent robbery it brings under your name. In the illustration of that volume twenty-eight of my photographs (which cost me time and money, besides other things) have been used without my permission and contrary to my wish, in itself a sufficiently indecent performance. But that is not the worst. Let me call your attention to the fact that twenty of those photographs are copyrighted, and not for amusement, but for the express purpose of protecting them. Twenty violations of the copyright law in one book is certainly doing pretty well. I inclose a list of the copyrighted pictures that you may, if you desire, search the records of the Librarian of Congress and satisfy yourself to what extent a sworn officer of the United States has succeeded in breaking United States law. My photographs are made to illustrate my own work, not to be sold or stolen; and I purpose to see this matter to its logical conclusion. The illegal publication of these photos shuts me out from using them for my own work, and is as tangible a loss to me as would be the theft of so much cash from my pocket. I must insist that they be paid for; and then omitted from the report altogether, or each must bear my name and date of copyright, as you are well aware the law demands.

* * * * * * *

Yours truly,

CHAS. F. LUMMIS.

ROBERT P. PORTER, Esq.,
Superintendent of the Census, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 14, 1893.

The following correspondence is published for the information of all concerned.

J. H. WARDLE, Chief Clerk.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 10, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, subject to your approval, I will direct that the text of all reports on the Eleventh Census, whether general or special, must be confined to the analysis and explanation of the tables comprehended in each report. This rule being subject to modifications when comparisons may be essential for a full understanding of the work in hand.

I am, very respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Acting Superintendent of Census.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., October 13, 1893.

SIR: The recommendation contained in your letter of the 10th instant, that the text of all reports on the Eleventh Census, whether general or special, must be confined to the analysis and explanation of the tables comprehended in each report, is approved. This rule being subject to modifications when comparisons may be essential for a full understanding of the work in hand.

Very respectfully,

WM. H. SIMS, Acting Secretary.

ACTING SUPERINTENDENT OF THE CENSUS.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator kindly state, if he knows, what publication it is that is so greatly revised that the electrotype or stereotype plates in the Printing Office can only be used in small parts?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know. I did not know anything about it until I read this report.

Mr. MANDERSON. Unquestionably that refers to the two works I have spoken of, the work upon the Five Civilized Tribes and the work upon Indians Taxed and Not Taxed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think it can possibly refer to the Five Civilized Tribes, because he says that work is going on, and he makes no objection to it.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then it probably refers to the other work, Indians Taxed and Not Taxed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I could not say, because I did not know that work was under discussion, and never heard of it. My impression is that it does not refer to either one of them. I did not ask anything about it, and I think he simply puts this in incidentally. I asked about the Indian matter.

Mr. MANDERSON. He is speaking, however, of the reports of Donaldson.

There is no question but that the proposition stated by the Senator from Alabama is a correct one. It may be that there is not a statute law, but there certainly is a practice and custom in the Executive Departments that where action has been taken upon a matter by an executive officer his successor does not overrule him and take contrary action. Undoubtedly Commissioner Wright (for whom I have the very highest respect, whose ability we all recognize, and whose honesty of purpose is unquestionable) is laboring under a mistake when he says that these works of Donaldson, prepared under the direction of Porter, his predecessor, were not approved by Porter. There is the gist of this whole matter. I have here a copy of a letter from Porter, in fact, I have two letters from Porter. One is dated March 10, 1894, addressed to Mr. Donaldson. After speaking of some personal matters that are between them, he said:

Both Secretary Noble and myself feel outraged at the treatment which your report has received.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not understand that Mr. Wright said anything about that. There was no approval or disapproval of Mr. Donaldson's report.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand he places his action upon that, that it is yet subject to revision by him because it was not approved.

Mr. COCKRELL. That may be, but he did not mention the fact. He did not discuss that question in this letter, as I recall it.

Mr. MANDERSON. In one of the letters read he certainly makes reference to that matter. I will find it before I get through.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me? I think the facts ought to be known.

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Here is what he refers to, probably, if the Senator will let me read it:

When I took charge of the Census Office, October 6, 1893, I found that the report on the five civilized tribes and the final report upon the Indians were under revision.

Mr. MANDERSON. Under revision?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what he says.

Mr. MANDERSON. That shows he did not consider them approved, because the revision of a work is not proof-reading.

Mr. HOAR. Let us have the facts as we go along. I do not suppose the honorable Senator from Alabama, or any other Senator, would suppose that the action of the successor was a revision or overruling or judging of the work of the predecessor, whether he had approved it formally or not. It was found that in a certain report there were great blocks of matter repeated from other Government publications, and that to a large extent they had been repeated without credit. Second, that there was a claim made that a larger number of illustrations were a violation of the copyright of an individual who threatened a suit, and whose claim, whether well founded or not, was apparently supported by the copyright records. Now, does any Senator say that whenever those circumstances have been brought for the first time to the knowledge of the Department they should not be acted upon? I grant if this knowledge had been brought to Mr. Porter and he had acted upon the validity of the copyright or the importance of this claim——

Mr. MANDERSON. Which he did. Let me interrupt the Senator far enough to say——

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish my sentence and then I will let the Senator state it, and he will no doubt do it better.

Mr. MANDERSON. All right.

Mr. HOAR. I grant if that was true, and this question now being passed upon had been considered, adjudged, and acted upon by Mr. Porter, then we should have to take the next step and determine whether, under any such circumstances, his successor should deal with it.

Mr. MORGAN. Allow me to say that a judge subsequently acting upon a matter which has been of record by his predecessor, can always set it aside for fraud.

Mr. HOAR. Or because of newly discovered evidence.

Mr. MORGAN. Or upon newly discovered evidence.

Mr. MANDERSON. But the difficulty with that position is that the letter from the man claiming the copyright is addressed not to Mr. Wright, but to Porter, and Porter acted upon it.

Mr. HOAR. Where is that evidence?

Mr. MANDERSON. I will show the evidence. If I may be allowed to go on I think I will reach all these propositions.

Mr. MORGAN. Let me ask the Senator from Nebraska if the copyrights on the pictures have not actually been extinguished?

Mr. MANDERSON. The copyrights on the pictures pertain to the works already issued. There is no claim on the part of Lummis that he is entitled to copyrights upon the pictures proposed to be put into the two works not yet published, but his claim is that upon the bulletins heretofore issued (and I had one of them here a moment ago; it is in the hands of the Senator from New Hampshire) there are certain pictures to which he is entitled to a copyright. But there is no claim on the part of Lummis that he is entitled to copyright upon the illustrations that are proposed to be put in the two works that are under revision.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Nebraska please state that the letter of Mr. Lummis addressed to Col. Porter, "Personal, Robert P. Porter, esq., Superintendent of the Census," is dated January 6, 1894, long after Mr. Porter went out of office, and it is dated then because he says he had just returned from South America?

Mr. MANDERSON. I understood that a prior claim was made before that time, before the letter of January 6, 1894.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield the floor to me for the purpose of making a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope we may go on for a few minutes longer.

Mr. QUAY. I insist on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 13, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 12, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment the bill (H. R. 1916) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge Little River, in the State of Arkansas; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1640) granting a pension to Otis Smith; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of the compilation prepared under the direction of the Committee on Finance, embracing a reprint of House bill 4864, with Senate amendments thereto suggested by the Committee on Finance, together with the existing tariff law and the Mills bill of 1888, with comparative statement as to rates of duty, etc., for the use of the Senate.

THE RULES.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I present the following report from the Committee on Rules——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], from the Committee on Rules, submits a report.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that there is no quorum present, and I object to the report being received.

The SPEAKER. No question is up——

Mr. BURROWS. I make the point of order that there is no quorum in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman until some question is before the House. The Journal has been approved. If the question had been made upon the approval of the Journal——

Mr. BURROWS. Before the reading of the Journal it has always been the practice that the suggestion of a member that no quorum is present raises the question.

The SPEAKER. But that suggestion was not made.

Mr. BURROWS. I know; but now it is attempted to do some business, to receive the report of a committee; and I suggest that there is no quorum present, and I object to the report being received at this time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor, and can not be taken off the floor in this way.

The SPEAKER. It has never been the practice of the House that the question of no quorum could be raised unless some action of the House was taken in the nature of a vote.

Mr. BURROWS. I had supposed it to be the uniform practice—I know it is in the other body, and I know it has been done here repeatedly—for instance, in the morning, before the Journal has been read, it has been the practice frequently to say, "There is no quorum present, Mr. Speaker."

The SPEAKER. That is because the rule provides that the Speaker shall take the chair at 12 o'clock, and, on the appearance of a quorum, cause the Journal to be read. Now, when some gentleman rises and says that a quorum has not appeared, of course the Speaker must ascertain the presence of a quorum, under the rule, before the Journal can be read; but after the Journal has been approved, then the presumption of course will be that a quorum is present, and no way of testing that question can arise until there comes up a question to be voted on in some way.

Mr. BURROWS. Then, under that holding, Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the House, I move a call of the House, for the purpose of ascertaining the presence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] has the floor, submitting a report from the Committee on Rules, and he can not be taken off the floor.

Mr. BURROWS. Does the Chair hold that I can not move a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the gentleman can not take the gentleman from Mississippi off the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BURROWS. I understood I was recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BURROWS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman to take the gentleman from Mississippi off the floor.

Mr. BURROWS. Then the Chair does not recognize my appeal?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman at all to take the gentleman from Mississippi off the floor. The Clerk will read the report of the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk began to read.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan raised the point of order that this was not admissible, and he takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair that it is admissible.

The SPEAKER. It is a question of recognition. The Chair stated that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] had been recognized.

Mr. REED. A gentleman is always entitled to recognition on a point of order.

The SPEAKER. No point of order is raised.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have the floor, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. REED. The point of order was raised that this was not in order, because there was no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. But there is no provision by which to ascertain the presence of a quorum until some question comes before the House.

Mr. REED. Suppose there is not. The Chair decides that, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] asks the judgment of the House by an appeal from the Chair, and under the rules of the House he is entitled to his appeal.

The SPEAKER. There has never been a practice of that sort.

Mr. REED. If the Speaker will permit, there has always been a practice of that sort. It is perfectly clear that the House has a right to appeal from any decision of the Speaker. The gentleman from Michigan has made the point that it is not in order, no matter what his reasons are for making that point, or what reasons the Chair has for his decision; the Chair has decided that it is not in order; and from that decision the gentleman from Michigan has taken an appeal; and under the first rule of the House he is entitled to that appeal. It is not a question of recognition, or of being taken off the floor; and a point of order always takes a member off the floor.

The SPEAKER. Not if any gentleman has the floor for debate.

Mr. REED. A point of order has always done that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal; and the Clerk will read the report of the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. REED. Can not I have an appeal from the decision of the Chair upon that point?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

Mr. REED. I do not——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be seated, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the report.

Mr. REED. I have another point I desire to make.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear the reading of the resolution.

Mr. REED. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report, which is as follows:

Rescind clause 1 of Rule VIII and insert in lieu thereof the following:

1. Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented, and shall vote on each question put, unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

Whenever in pursuance of section 5, Article I of the Constitution of the United States, the House of Representatives, at the request of one-fifth of the members present, shall order the yeas and nays of its members on any question to be entered on its Journal, and upon the call of roll of its members for that purpose a quorum thereof shall fail to vote, each member within the Hall of the House who shall fail to vote when his name is called, unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question; and each member who shall be absent from the Hall of the House when his name is called, unless he has been excused, or is necessarily prevented from being present, shall be fined the sum of $10; and the Speaker shall cause an entry of such fine to be made against such members on the Journal of the House, and the same shall be collected and paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The entry of such fine shall be made substantially in the following form, namely: "The House of Representatives of the United States, at the request of one-fifth of its members present, having ordered the yeas and nays of its members on a question pending therein, to be entered on its Journal, and upon a call of the roll of its members for that purpose, a quorum thereof having failed to vote, and [here set out the name and State of the member or members fined] having been within the Hall of the House and failed to vote when his name was called, without having a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question (or, as the case may be, 'absent from the Hall of the House when his name was called, without having been excused, or necessarily prevented from being present'), it is therefore ordered and adjudged by the House of Representatives of the United States of America that a fine of $10 be, and the same is hereby, entered against [here set out the name of the member fined], which sum shall be collected and paid into the Treasury of the United States."

The names of all members who shall be fined on the same roll call may be included in a single entry on the Journal; and if fines shall be entered on more than one call during the same day, the second entry on the Journal relating thereto, shall have the caption, "Fine number two," the third entry, "Fine number three," and so on.

It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the House to certify to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House the names of all members against whom fines are so entered, and unless they shall be voluntarily paid to him, he shall deduct the amount of said fines from the compensation of said members, and all sums that may be paid to, or so deducted by him, shall be paid by him into the Treasury of the United States.

A call of the roll of the members of the House shall not be deemed to have been completed until the Speaker shall have made all necessary orders regarding fines which may be imposed on members in pursuance of the provisions of this rule.

It shall not be in order to move, nor shall the Speaker entertain a request for unanimous consent, to remit the fines required to be entered as aforesaid.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. REED. The point I desire to make——

Mr. CATCHINGS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order, and I rose to the point of order prior to that motion, Mr. Speaker, and addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi to demand the previous question.

Mr. REED. I claim the right of a member to make a point of order prior to that, and I rose for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. REED. My point of order—am I recognized?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Mississippi to demand the previous question. Pending that, the gentleman from Maine rises to a point of order. The Chair will hear him.

Mr. REED. I am recognized on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Pending that, the Chair will hear the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. REED. The Chair must either, it seems to me——

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the previous question. As many as are in favor of ordering the previous question will say aye, and those opposed will say no.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. REED. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 100, noes 9.

Mr. REED. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. REED. I desire to make the point of order.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not interrupt the proceedings.

Mr. REED. The point of order I desire to make, and which the Chair did not hear, is——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. That the House is already dividing on another proposition.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and the Speaker announced that 90 gentleman having arisen, a sufficient number, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Mr. CATCHINGS and Mr. BURROWS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80; a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 11, not voting 200; as follows:

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 142, and the nays are 11. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; when the following-named members failed to respond:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee). The doors will now be closed, and the Clerk will call the names of those members who failed to respond on the first call. Upon this call excuses will be in order.

Mr. COOMBS (when his name was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask to be excused until Monday next, on account of ill health.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HAUGEN (when the name of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague [Mr. COOPER] be excused indefinitely, on account of illness.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GEISSENHAINER (when the name of Mr. CORNISH was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. CORNISH] be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what reason?

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. I understand that he is detained at home by illness.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. NORTHWAY (when the name of Mr. FUNK was called). Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FUNK] is sick at his hotel, and I ask that he be indefinitely excused.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN (when the name of Mr. HOOKER of New York was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague [Mr. HOOKER] be excused on account of serious illness in his family.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GEAR (when the name of Mr. HULL was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. HULL] was called out of town yesterday on important business, and I ask that he be excused for three days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks that his colleague [Mr. HULL] be excused on account of important business. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. I object.

Mr. GEAR. Then I move that my colleague [Mr. HULL] be excused for three days, on account of important business, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the Chair can not entertain that motion at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon the point of order.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] objects to the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] that his colleague [Mr. HULL] be excused on account of important business. The gentleman from Iowa moves that his colleague be excused, and the gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that the Chair can not entertain the motion.

Mr. REED. What is to be done with the absentee?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Will the Chair cause the rule to be read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read paragraph 2 of Rule XV.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the absence of a quorum, fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, and in all calls of the House the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; the doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested, wherever they may be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured; and the House shall determine upon what condition they shall be discharged.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly evident that only excuses for the absence of members can be presented at this time. This is a proposition to excuse a man from being present for a certain period hereafter; but nothing is in order at this time but to ask that members who are absent be excused. This is a call for the purpose of enabling excuses to be made for members who are not present.

Mr. REED. That is not the language of the rule. The language of the rule is "those for whom no sufficient excuse is made."

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call for a ruling upon the point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must request gentlemen to resume their seats. It is impossible for the Chair to hear what gentlemen are saying. The Chair desires to hear this point of order discussed, and will be pardoned for saying that it is quite an important one, and gentlemen would do well to give attention to it. [A pause.] The Chair will now hear the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] on the point of order.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, the rule expressly provides—

The doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested, wherever they be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will pardon the Chair for asking a question. The language of the rule as just read is "those for whom no sufficient excuse is made." Who is to be the judge of the sufficiency of the excuse?

Mr. CATCHINGS. The excuse that the rule contemplates is an excuse for absence. Under this rule, a member during this call may rise and give some excuse for the absence of his colleague, or any other gentleman. But that is not the proposition here at all. No excuse whatever is made in this case for the absence of this member—no pretense of an excuse is offered for his absence; but the proposition is that the House do now excuse him for the future.

I submit that this proposition is clearly in violation of the terms of the rule, which simply contemplates that when on such a call as this the name of an absent member is called some gentleman present may, if he desires to do so, offer an excuse for the absent member—an excuse then existing which would justify his absence. But, as I have said, that is not the proposition here. No excuse is offered for the absence of this gentleman; but the proposition is that the House shall now excuse him. I submit that the point is well taken.

Mr. REED. Does the Chair desire that the other side of this question be heard?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a very important matter; and the Chair begs leave to state that, according to his recollection, motions of this kind have been entertained heretofore——

Mr. REED. Always.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair is informed by the Journal Clerk that probably there has been a roll call during this Congress in the midst of another roll call on a motion to excuse a member. That, of course, is going very far; and the Chair would incline to think, if such is the rule, that it ought not to be. But the Chair would be glad to hear gentlemen on both sides of this question.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I wish to suggest that though this thing may have been done heretofore, that does not furnish a precedent for again doing it, unless a point of order was made at the time and overruled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is true; and the Chair does not remember that the point of order was ever made. For that reason he begs leave to state that this is quite an important matter.

Mr. REED. The matter is so simple, that it seems to me to need nothing but a statement. The rule says:

In the absence of a quorum, fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, and in all calls of the House the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; the doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested.

"Those for whom no sufficient excuse is made" may be sent for. Nobody else can be sent for except those for whom no sufficient excuse is made. Now, who is to judge whether the excuse is sufficient? Obviously nobody but the House of Representatives or that portion of it which is present compelling the attendance of absent members. It has been the invariable practice——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will pardon the Chair a moment. The Chair a few moments ago addressed to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] the question just repeated by the gentleman from Maine—Who is to be the judge of the sufficiency of the excuse? The question also presents itself when is that sufficiency to be determined—whether the roll call shall be stopped for that purpose or whether the question shall be determined after the completion of the roll call?

Mr. REED. This very roll call is a call of members for excuses. It is for that very purpose that the roll is being called—in order that the business of the House may proceed in orderly fashion. When the name of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] was called an excuse was presented; one of his colleagues has moved that he be excused. The case is so simple that I can not think argument can be necessary unless something further be presented on the other side.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I would like the gentleman to state what excuse has been offered for the absence of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. REED. On account of important business.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That is not stated. The motion is now that he be excused.

Mr. REED. Certainly; and that is the reason stated.

Mr. GEAR. I stated, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague was called out of town by important business.

Mr. REED. It has been the invariable custom of the House to allow excuses to be made on this call, and is founded on a plain rule of the House. The House has no power to order the arrest of a member unless it has first passed on the question whether he has a sufficient excuse. If he makes no excuse it is presumed that he has none to offer; but if an excuse is made it is incumbent upon the House to determine its sufficiency.

Mr. GEAR. Mr. Speaker, I shall state that I gave as a reason for the desirability of excusing my colleague, Mr. HULL, the fact that he was called suddenly out of town on account of important business. He had not time to get leave of absence, but left the matter in my charge, and requested me to state that he had been called out of the city on important business. I asked that he be excused and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] objected. I then moved that he be excused. This I am clear has been the custom, as I understand the practice of the House for many years on this second call of the roll. It has frequently happened since I have been here for members to ask that their colleagues be excused, various reasons being assigned under such circumstances.

I can state, if I am correct in my recollection, an incident that happened within my own knowledge. On an occasion similar to this, during the absence of my colleague, Mr. PERKINS, a request was made that he be excused, which was objected to, whereupon a motion was made to excuse him. Objection came from that side of the House, and on that question a roll call was had. I think it will be found in the proceedings of about the 8th or 10th of January.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is this further difficulty in the mind of the Chair at this time, raised by the point of order, although the gentleman did not call direct attention to this matter. The Chair is of opinion that the Speaker of the House has held all along that when the House finds itself without a quorum it can only have power to excuse a member for the day, and not grant an indefinite leave of absence, and inasmuch as the motion in this case is indefinite, the Chair thinks it would be obnoxious to that point of order.

Mr. GEAR. I did ask that he be excused for three days, but objection was made. I then moved that he be excused.

Mr. REED. The gentleman does not ask indefinite leave of absence, but simply moves that he be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman to ask that he be excused for three days.

Mr. GEAR. I did ask that he be excused for three days, but when that was objected to I made a motion that he be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the difficulty the Chair found in the motion of the gentleman; that it involved the granting of leave of absence for three days.

Mr. GEAR. But after that, Mr. Speaker, I moved simply that he be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that would be as far as the House would have power to go under the circumstances.

Mr. REED. If the Chair pleases, there is no question about it. If the member is excused his arrest can not be ordered. That is all there is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentlemen had better limit his motion to one day.

Mr. BURROWS. That is just what the gentleman has done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. GEAR. I simply moved that he be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That he now be excused.

Mr. GEAR. And the pending question is on that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wanted to be fair and not overrule the motion on the ground of its being made for three days. If the gentleman makes the motion but for the one day, the Chair thinks it makes a material difference in the situation.

Mr. REED. He moves that he be excused now simply.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to say this, Mr. Speaker: It seems to me we will more clearly see the bearing of this proposition if we take into consideration the object of this call which is now proceeding. It strikes me that some confusion may have arisen in the minds of some of the gentlemen in the House by reason of alluding to the present proceeding as a "roll call." This is not a question involving a vote of the House. It is simply a mode to ascertain who are present, and yet the term "roll call" has been applied to it.

If we proceed upon the proper assumption that this is simply calling the list of the names of the members, then we find exactly an answer to the present situation. When a member's name is called under this procedure only three things are possible. One is that he shall answer "here," present; the other is that he shall be noted as absent if he is not here; while the third alternative is that some one on the floor shall offer an excuse for his absence. It is not a roll call on a vote that may not be interrupted under the technical rules of the House, but a call of the names of the members in their alphabetical order for the express purpose of determining who are here and who are absent, and for whom excuses may be offered.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a decision of the question in the second volume of the Journal of the Fifty-second Congress, on page 77.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is that the case of Mr. Stahlnecker?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am not certain what the case is. It is cited in the Digest, on page 284, and the reference is to page 77 of the second volume of the Journal of the Fifty-second Congress. If the Chair will permit me, I will read the Digest, page 284, in which reference is made to that decision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DOLLIVER (reading):

During a call of the House, a quorum is not required to excuse a member from attendance, nor to determine the question of reconsidering the vote by which a member has been excused.

Showing plainly the custom of the House to interpose a decision of these questions in the midst of this roll call.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I can not find in the Digest a reference to any proceedings of the House where a roll call has been interrupted by a motion to excuse members. Therefore we are to go to the rule itself to determine what can be done in the premises.

The first clause of Rule XV provides—

Upon every roll call the names of the members shall be called alphabetically—and so forth.

And after the roll has been once called the Clerk shall call in their alphabetical order the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote.

Now, this refers to a roll call to ascertain who votes when a proposition is pending on which a vote is being taken; but the rule says that upon every roll call the names shall be called in this way. The second clause of the rule relates to calls of the House proper. Now, let us note this language:

In the absence of a quorum, fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members.

That first part has no bearing upon this. The next clause bears on what we are about to do now.

And in all calls of the House the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted.

Now, instead of calling the roll once for the purpose of ascertaining the absentees and noting them, we are, by a custom that has prevailed here, calling it twice, so as to permit every member who is present to have his name recorded as present.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order. We can not hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is well taken. The gentleman will suspend until order is restored. Gentlemen on the left of the Chair will please cease conversation. There is so much conversation in the rear of the seats that it destroys the sound in front. The Chair begs gentlemen who desire to converse to retire to the cloakroom.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, as there was some confusion I will repeat what I was stating, that the rule provides that in calls of the House the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk and the absentees noted. By a custom of the House the Clerk calls the roll twice, so as to give every member who may be present the opportunity of having his name recorded as present, and the absentees noted, so that the Clerk shall note on his Journal only those who are absent. Now, when this has been done, when the absentees are noted, and that means when all absentees are noted—not one or two, not the gentleman whose name has been mentioned at this time for excuse, but when all absentees are noted—then what takes place?

The doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested.

Now this is simply a question as to when it is in order to make another motion. I hold that it is not in order to interrupt this roll call until all the absentees have been noted. When that is done, you can take up each member separately and move that he be excused, and on that question the yeas and nays may be ordered, as upon any other question; but until all the absentees have been noted it is not in order to interrupt this roll call, because we are now ascertaining who the absentees are, and when we have done that, then we are ready for something else. Now, I have never known, in the proceedings of this body, the roll call to be interrupted by any motion. There is no such thing known as having two roll calls pending at the same time, one incomplete and the other in progress of being taken.

Mr. REED. Why, we have that situation now.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. REED. You have got a roll call on the question of discharging the proceedings of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and right in the middle of it you have a roll call on this new rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. REED. That is what you have got now.

Mr. SPRINGER. We completed that roll call, and every member who was here was called upon to vote, and the Chair announced the result, and it appeared from that result that a quorum was not present, and therefore everything fell. Nothing had been ordered at all, because we can not do any business when a quorum is not present, except to secure the attendance of absentees or adjourn.

Mr. REED. The Speaker decided that it did not fall yesterday, and decided that it was a question which came up of itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. The subject-matter came up of itself.

Mr. REED. That it came up to-day, with the roll call ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. And the yeas and nays having been ordered upon it, the question was again submitted on another yea-and-nay vote. What I am contending about, Mr. Speaker, is that the roll call is an entity of itself. It is supposed to be instantaneous, and nothing can interfere that requires another roll call until that is finished. Now, we have not finished the roll call upon this call.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Where, then, does the gentleman find that definition of this proceeding as a roll call—that it is instantaneous, and can not be interrupted? It is a call of the list of members for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are here or not; and if not here, of ascertaining whether a proper and satisfactory excuse be made.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is true. Now, we are ascertaining who are the absent members, and when the absentees are noted, then we have some other order of business that we can do—to excuse them or to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. Has not the gentleman noticed that upon a second call, during a call of the House, the Speaker always precedes the call by this statement:

The doors will now be closed, the Clerk will again call the roll, and during this call excuses will be in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes.

Mr. RAY. Now, that second roll call is simply for the purpose of affording members an opportunity to present excuses. It is a call of the absentees. When a member's name is reached and he is absent, it is in order to ask that he be excused. This may be done by unanimous consent. If the excuse is offered the Speaker always says, "If there be no objection, the gentleman will be excused." If he is not excused by unanimous consent, some member objects.

Now, when that objection is made, what must be done? A motion must be made that the absentee be excused, certainly, or else he can not be excused and will stand in contempt of the House. Now, then, if it is in order to excuse him, it is in order to move that he be excused, if anyone objects. If it is in order to move that he be excused, then you must proceed to act upon the motion. That has been the universal practice in this House during all its sessions and in all Congresses. The last call—roll call, if you please to so call it—is simply a call of the list of absentees, so that they may be excused and escape arrest.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman's question has resolved itself into an argument, and not a question; but I will answer his speech.

Mr. RAY. Has not that been the uniform practice of the House?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no recollection of this roll call ever having been interfered with and another motion put to the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You should have your memory and recollection refreshed.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will call the gentleman's attention to a case.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Iowa states that he is able to cite such a case. I would like to hear it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is almost impossible for the Chair to hear what gentlemen are saying, there is so much talking and confusion on the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Iowa seems to have a case that he desires to cite. I would like to hear.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If gentlemen will proceed in order, the Chair would like to hear him, but it is impossible to hear when two gentlemen are talking at the same time to hear either one.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will call the gentleman's attention——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I find in the second volume of the Journal of the Fifty-second Congress, page 77, where we were exactly in the same proceedings we are in now:

The absentees were again called, when Mr. CULBERSON was excused from attendance.

On motion of Mr. Butler, Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa was excused from attendance.

Mr. HEARD moved that Mr. RYAN be excused from attendance.

And the question being put thereon and no quorum voting,

Mr. KILGORE made the point that a quorum was necessary to decide said motion.

The Speaker pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY in the Chair) overruled the point of order, holding that a quorum was not required to excuse a member from attendance pending a call of the House.

This record shows that the proceedings occurred pending a call of the roll, where the proceedings were upon the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the abentees were being called. The Chair desires to ask the gentlemen from Iowa if there was a roll call upon the motion to excuse that gentleman when he was excused?

Mr. DOLLIVER (reading):

On motion of Mr. WISE, Mr. O'Ferral was excused from attendance.

Mr. KILGORE moved to reconsider the vote by which Mr. O'Ferral was excused.

Mr. WISE moved to lay that motion on the table.

The question being put upon the latter motion,

The Speaker pro tempore declared that said motion was carried.

Mr. KILGORE made the point that no quorum had voted, and that a quorum was necessary to dispose of said motion.

The Speaker pro tempore overruled the point of order, holding that a quorum was not necessary to decide a question incidental to a call of the House.

Mr. BUNN moved to dispense with further proceedings under the call; which motion was agreed to.

It does not say whether a roll call was had, or how the vote was taken, and I presume it does not make any difference.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is nothing in the record cited by the gentleman to show that that proceeding occurred before the absentees were noted.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Exactly, that record is made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I contend that it is in order to make this motion after the absentees have been noted.

Mr. DOLLIVER. So far as the question of taking the vote by yeas and nays is concerned, it has been held that the yeas and nays may be demanded on questions arising during a call of the House in like manner as on other occasions. (Journal, 1, 46, page 376.)

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. That is on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to the fact that excuses were entertained on the second call. On motion of Mr. KILGORE it was ordered that there be a call of the House. The call of the House was proceeded with, and a certain number of members failed to answer to their names. On the second call, the same as we are having now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] was excused, and on motion of Mr. Butler the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] was excused.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is when the absentees were called. That is what I want to have done now.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is exactly what we are doing now. During the second call the names of those members were called and they were excused on motion. That is why the names are called a second time. There is no other reason known to man for making this second call except to give members an opportunity to respond, or to have excuses offered for them and to be excused if the House so decides.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen will please suspend and give the Chair an opportunity to examine two cases which are now before him, and in which it would appear that a roll call was had during a call of the House.

Mr. GEAR. There was one case that occurred this session where a roll call was had.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Can the gentleman refer to it in the RECORD?

Mr. GEAR. It is in the Journal, and the Clerk can refer to it. On the 12th of January, I think it was, several gentlemen from my State were absent under a similar condition of affairs to that which exists now, and requests were made that they all be excused. The House, probably not being in as good temper as usual, refused to excuse my colleague [Mr. PERKINS]. Objection was made to the request that he be excused, and a motion was made to excuse him and a roll call was had on that motion to excuse him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The best evidence as to what took place on that occasion would be the production of the RECORD, and that record is not now in the hands of the Chair. In the mean time, the Chair desires to call attention to two cases which he has before him. The first was in the Fifty-second Congress, first session. A matter was pending, and a vote was had on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that the House resolve itself into the Committe of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering revenue bills. The point of no quorum was made, and the Chair appointed tellers. The yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. MCMILLIN, and on the vote the yeas were 31, the nays 167, and not voting, 158. The point of no quorum was made, and a motion was made that the House adjourn, whereupon a call of the House was moved and was had. The gentleman from New York,

Mr. Stahlnecker, failed to answer to his name, and on the second call a motion was made to excuse him. Pending that, a motion was made to adjourn, which was voted down. Then the question was taken on a motion to excuse the gentleman from New York [Mr. Stahlnecker], and on that question the yeas and nays were ordered. The yeas were 64, and the nays were 131.

That is a case in which the call of the House was suspended, and a roll call was had on the question of excusing a member.

Mr. REED. I have another case before me, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair also has before him a case which occurred in the Fifty-third Congress, first session, which appears on page 1490 of the RECORD. Is that the case to which the gentleman from Maine refers?

Mr. REED. It is the same case. There are repeated instances there; two pages of them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the gentleman has that case before him, he will please state the facts for the benefit of the House.

Mr. REED. There are several cases of excuses, commencing on page 1491 of the RECORD:

Mr. HUDSON. I move that my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] be excused on account of important business.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUDSON. Division.

The House divided; and there were ayes 89, noes 50.

So Mr. HARRIS was excused.

Mr. HULL (when the name of Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON] is absent from the city on an engagement of a year's standing, and I ask that he be excused.

Mr. LACEY. He already has leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to ask that he be excused, as the gentleman has leave of absence.

That fully recognizes the point we are contending for.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE (when the name of Mr. HICKS was called). I ask that my colleague [Mr. HICKS] be excused on account of important business.

Several objections were made.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I understand he has leave.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that he is so recorded.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE (when the name of Mr. HOPKINS of Pennsylvania was called). I ask that my colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] be excused on account of sickness.

Now, that shows conclusively enough——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule on the matter unless some gentleman desires to be heard on the other side.

Mr. REED. I want to add that there is one other case where a roll call took place—on page 1492.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I would like to be heard on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I want to refer to the case cited by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], which probably had some influence on the mind of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Very little. [Laughter.] The Chair does not think that case applies at all in the same way that the other cases do, inasmuch as there was no roll call.

Mr. STOCKDALE. There is one other fact which has not been brought to the attention of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STOCKDALE. This record not only shows there was no roll call on the question of excusing the member, but it also shows that these proceedings were after the roll call—after the second call for absentees.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Oh, no.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Why does the gentleman suggest that my statement is not correct?

Mr. DOLLIVER. The RECORD says "pending the second roll call."

Mr. STOCKDALE. It does not say "pending the second roll call." There is where the gentleman did not read it correctly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wants to remind the gentleman from Mississippi that there is no "second roll call," properly speaking.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Well, the roll is called the second time. When Mr. Clay was confronted with the idea that there was a difference between a question of privilege and a privileged question he said it was a difference between "Jennie, come out," and "come out, Jennie." It is a second roll call or a second call of the roll, whichever you may choose to term it.

The absentees were again called, when Mr. CULBERSON was excused from attendance.

Now, gentlemen assume that this was when Mr. CULBERSON'S name was reached; and that is the only reason they say it was pending the roll call. But following this matter down we find that—

On motion of Mr. Butler, Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa was excused.

We find further—

Mr. HEARD moved that Mr. FYAN be excused.

Now, if the names of absentees were being called alphabetically, Mr. FYAN'S name should have been called before that of Mr. HENDERSON. So that these excuses were not presented as the roll call proceeded. Then, after some other motions, a motion to dispense with all proceedings under the call was entertained and carried; and that has never been done since the foundation of this House while the roll call was incomplete. So that these requests for excuses of absent members must have been entertained after the second call had been completed.

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. If there be no provision in the rule for calling the roll a second time, can there be made at this moment any point upon a disturbance of or departure from an order that does not exist?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order——

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule unless the gentleman desires to present some case not already referred to.

The Chair was about to say that he thought the point of order ought to be overruled for this reason: The precedents, so far as the Chair can find any, have all been in favor of calling the roll where the demand for the yeas and nays has been made on motions which have frequently been entertained to excuse a member. Now the Chair thinks that the roll call is completed technically by the first call. It may not be necessary to decide that question; but the present call is simply a call under the rules of the House for the presentation of excuses for absentees.

It is more methodical and orderly to call the names alphabetically, to the end that members may, in an orderly manner, offer excuses for absentees. For this reason the Chair supposes it has been customary to call the names of absentees and to call them alphabetically. But really the roll call is completed with the first call; and these motions with reference to excusing members do not interfere with the roll call. The Chair therefore feels constrained to entertain the motion to excuse the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. REED) there were—ayes 128, noes 4.

Mr. REED. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. REED and Mr. CATCHINGS were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 0.

Mr. REED. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 84, nays 105, not voting 164; as follows:

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. LACEY (who had voted in the affirmative). Mr. Speaker, I change my vote from "aye" to "no."

Mr. BOEN. I desire to change my vote from "aye" to "no."

Mr. DAVIS. I also change my vote from "aye" to "no."

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, I should like to vote on this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall of the House and failed to hear his name?

Mr. BRODERICK. I was temporarily out of the House, and my name was called during my absence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain the request unless the gentleman was in the Hall at the time his name was actually called.

Mr. BARWIG. I change my vote from "aye" to "no."

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I desire to change my vote from "no" to "aye."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CATCHINGS and Mr. LACEY addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LACEY. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I send a resolution to the desk, Mr. Speaker, for immediate action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa moves to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Had I not been recognized?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Mississippi, but the gentleman from Iowa moves to reconsider, which motion is in order.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Well, let us have the resolution read.

Mr. REED. A motion to reconsider must be first determined. That motion is in order, and must be decided.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Not necessarily. It has not to be decided at once.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. REED. We ask action on the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Mississippi had made a motion which the Chair recognized.

Mr. REED. But he had no right to make it when the motion to reconsider was pending. The gentleman from Iowa was on the floor asking recognition for his motion. A member can not be deprived of the right of reconsideration by the intervention of any other motion when he is on the floor to make that motion. This is utterly without precedent.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman from Iowa had clearly advertised his purpose to move to reconsider by changing his vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course the Chair can not tell for what purpose gentlemen change their votes; and it will be remembered that several other gentlemen did so.

Mr. REED. I wish to make a point of order against the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi in addition. I want that to be understood.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. LACEY. I insist upon my motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The fact that the gentleman from Iowa makes a motion to reconsider has been advertised to by the gentleman from Maine. The gentleman would have two days, under the rules, in which the vote on his motion could be taken.

Mr. LACEY. But not under a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule provides that the motion to reconsider may be made at any time within two days. So that there was no effort made to cut the gentleman off from his motion. The gentleman from Mississippi rises and makes a motion, and the Chair will cause that motion to be read.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order, if the Chair please, that it is entirely out of order for any motion affecting anything except this immediate call to be entertained by the Chair pending a motion to reconsider this vote.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is not pending.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, it is pending. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has moved to reconsider, and there is no question of privilege, under the rules, any higher than the right to have a vote upon a motion to reconsider. There is no vote declared in this House upon which the Speaker does not raise that question of reconsideration, and request the House to table that motion, before the matter is disposed of. It is in the hands of the House until that is done. The Speaker says, "The gentleman from so and so moves to reconsider and to lay that motion on the table, and without objection the latter motion will be agreed to." Until that is done the measure has not passed out from under the action of the House. And, pending that, it certainly can not be in order for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] to obtrude here some entirely extraneous proposition.

Mr. REED. Let us have the rule of the House read, Rule XVIII. If there is a positive rule of the House it is that:

When a motion has been made and carried or lost, it shall be in order for any member of the majority, on the same or succeeding day, to move for the reconsideration thereof, and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions except the consideration of a conference report, a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, or to take a recess, and shall not be withdrawn, etc.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What rule does the gentleman read?

Mr. REED. The first section of Rule XVIII. If there is such a thing as language determining a matter this does, and I defy any man in this House to show a single instance where a member has not the right to reconsider. There never has been an instance where a man has been taken off his feet by the recognition of the Speaker under those circumstances. The Speaker has the right to recognize in certain cases where the rights of the members are equal; but where a member's motion has the right to precede it is the duty of the Speaker to recognize him, and when he states that he rose for the purpose of asking recognition, that is enough, under the regulations and rules of this House and under the rules of parliamentary law.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that——

Mr. REED. Suppose the gentleman had got up to move to adjourn. Suppose there had been a quorum present, and he had moved that the House adjourn to a day certain. Why, there can not be any doubt about it. The right of recognition by the Chair, as between individuals, is simply between members in the same right; but there are motions which have precedence, and those motions are the recognition of the House, which is superior to the recognition of the Speaker, or rather it is a recognition which the Speaker is bound to carry out. I hope we may be able, in the wreck of worlds, to save some few parliamentary principles.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand this is merely a question as to whether the gentlemen from Mississippi——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen will please be in order and resume their seats. The Chair can not hear this debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand this is simply a question as to whether the gentleman from Mississippi, having first been recognized, his motion should be stated to the House.

Mr. REED. It is not a question of first recognition.

Mr. SPRINGER. One moment, please. If the gentleman from Iowa, after that motion is stated, makes a motion which under the rules takes precedence, the Chair must first put the motion of the gentleman from Iowa. If not, he must put the motion which is of highest precedence. We have not reached that point yet. The question is as to whether the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] can now be stated. It may be one of the motions that takes precedence of the motion to reconsider. If it is, we must pass upon that first.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It can not be one of those motions, because it is a resolution on paper. He sent it up to the desk.

Mr. SPRINGER. We do not know what it is. We have not heard it read.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There are only three motions that can take precedence.

Mr. SPRINGER. He may want to make one of those motions.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But he does not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. The Chair will hear gentlemen who desire to be heard on this point, but the Chair begs gentlemen to proceed in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the first proposition involved here is the right given by the rule of the House to make this motion. That is the first proposition. The motion is made, and the motion is pending. Now, the next question under the rule and practice of the House is at what time shall that vote be taken?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the question the gentleman from Mississippi now interposes—some motion, some resolution, some procedure.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Proposes to interpose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Or proposes to interpose. The House is not advised as to what that is. I submit that under the rules of the House there are just three motions that he can make and that can take the place of the motion to reconsider and the vote upon the motion to reconsider. Why, look at the practice of the House from time immemorial. The only way we ever get along with any business in the House is that the Speaker sui sponti puts the motion to the House to reconsider supposed to have been made by the member in charge of the bill or measure, and instantly upon the passage of the bill or the defeat of the bill, the motion is thereupon put by the Speaker, recognizing the fact that it takes precedence of all other motions or resolutions or matters of procedure, except those included in the rules of the House. I submit that we can not afford to repeal rules that we have in order to get to others we know not of.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to suggest that we had this question up a few days ago, when we were acting under a special order, and the then occupant of the Chair (the Speaker) held that this motion was in order first; but afterwards, when his attention was called to the fact that the special order under which the House was acting forbade the acceptance of intervening motions, he declined to submit any question on the motion to reconsider. But the decision of the Chair as to the general rule was in harmony with the claim we make now. The Chair then refused to permit the motion to reconsider or submit that question or to permit an appeal from his ruling upon the question, for the reason that under the special order the general rules were suspended.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But we are not acting under any suspension of the rule now.

Mr. REED. If the Chair desires to hear anything more I will ask to be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to present his opinion upon this matter, and will now state what it was. The motion, to reconsider is a privileged motion and can be made at any time on the day on which the matter is disposed of or on the succeeding day under the rules. As the Chair was first inclined to look at it, he thought that after the motion was made it was not privileged to be called up then necessarily, and it would not be in some instances. The Chair finds a ruling as far back as the Thirty-fourth Congress, as follows:

> On the same or succeeding day after the vote is taken it is in order at any time to move its reconsideration and have the motion entered on the Journal, even when a member is on the floor.

It may be entered upon the Journal and it may be made when a member is on the floor; and it is also decided that it may be done pending a call of the roll, and that is necessary, because the time may expire within which the motion can be made. But the difficulty in the mind of the Chair is found in Rule XVIII:

> When a motion has been made and carried or lost, it shall be in order for any member of the majority, on the same or succeeding day, to move for the reconsideration thereof, and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions except the consideration of a conference report, a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, or to take a recess, etc.

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi has sent up a motion. It may be one of those motions. The Clerk will therefore report it, so that the Chair will see whether it takes priority over the motion to reconsider.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman claim that it does?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman claim that it is a conference report?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let it be read.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman rises for the purpose of introducing a superior resolution, it is designable in distinct terms, and he could say it is a conference report, which he will not undertake to say. It can not be a motion to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn, because there is no quorum present. It might be a motion to adjourn or to take a recess, but that would not be in writing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Some of the motions which are preferred need not be in writing.

Mr. REED. Why, of course I do not care whether the resolution is strictly required to be in writing or not, but as a method of procedure it has always been the custom in this House for a member, when he claims that his motion had precedence, to announce what that motion of precedence was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the statement which the gentleman was about to make, and then will hear the gentleman from Maine. The Chair will make a statement, and then will hear the gentleman from Mississippi. Some of the motions which are given precedence under the rule must be in writing——

Mr. REED. A conference report, for instance, is one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's proposition might be a conference report.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Mississippi say it is?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman would not be called upon to state that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understood the gentleman from Mississippi to say distinctly that it was a resolution. That is not a motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a motion under the rule. A motion may be in writing, and the Chair is of opinion that this should be read, and he directs the Clerk to read it. Afterwards the Chair will hear the gentleman from Mississippi.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That all leaves of absence, except for sickness, be and the same are hereby revoked, and the Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to notify all members absent, except on account of sickness, that their attendance upon the sessions of the House is required; and that further proceedings under this call be dispensed with.

Mr. BOUTELLE (during the reading). Now, Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order on that. There is no need to read it all through. It discloses in its first lines that it is not one of the privileged motions contemplated by the rule.

Mr. REED. I make a point of order against the motion itself. I want that understood.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly. All points of order are reserved.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Of course all points of order are reserved.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a perusal of the second paragraph of Rule XV will make it perfectly and absolutely clear that the only object of giving members the opportunity on a call of the House to offer excuses for their absence is to avoid their being included in an order for their arrest. The language of the rule is plain: "The doors shall then be closed and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may"—not "shall"—"may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested wherever they may be found."

The calling of the names of members on this call for excuses is but a prelude to the further execution of the rule by the issuance of an order for the arrest of the absentees. But here is not a proposition to arrest anybody. Here, in this resolution which I have sent to the desk, is a proposition which contemplates no man's arrest, which contemplates dispensing with further proceedings under this call, which would itself cover the object of the motion for the excuse of this member, which would itself excuse him: so that no man's rights are violated by this proposition. It simply directs the Sergeant-at-Arms to notify absent members by telegraph that their attendance is requested. The resolution is, in one sense of the word, a proposition to excuse this very member by dispensing with all further proceedings under the call.

Nobody contemplates asking an order for his arrest, or for the arrest of any other member; and the only object under the rule of calling the roll a second time is that members may have an opportunity to have excuses presented for them and thus avoid being arrested. So that necessarily, proceeding as we are under a call of the House, this proposition is superior to a motion to excuse a member, and still more superior to a proposition to reconsider the vote by which the House has excused or failed to excuse. If this resolution shall be adopted this member is ipso facto excused, so that this is entirely different from a case where we are proceeding in the House itself, and where only conference reports or other privileged matters of that kind can intervene.

We are now proceeding under a call of the House, and my resolution is necessarily superior to a motion to excuse a member, or to a motion to reconsider a vote on excusing a member, because if it is adopted, it dispenses with all further proceedings under the call of the House and removes all possibility of the arrest of the member whom the House is asked to excuse, or of any other member. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the point of order will not lie against it. It is superior to the motion to reconsider; it is superior to the motion to excuse; it is superior to all other motions because it does not contemplate anybody's arrest, and it does take the place of those other motions by dispensing with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States provides that "a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide." Now, the Chair wants to bear in mind carefully one fact, viz, that a House in order to do business must have a quorum. For one purpose alone less than a quorum may act, and that purpose and the manner of its execution are both defined by the Constitution of the United States and by nothing else.

The Constitution provides that a House with a quorum may prescribe a certain course of action which may be followed by less than a quorum, for the purpose of obtaining the attendance of a quorum. The power of less than a quorum is expressly limited by the rules of the House. It does not admit of enlargement. Doubtless the House might have provided better rules than those that we have here. Doubtless it might have made better provision than that which is before us, but such as it is we must be governed by it until the full House changes it.

I apprehend that what I am saying now is elementary. I apprehend it must be clearly within the judgment of every man. First, the power that we are attempting to exercise is a power which must be granted by a full House and can not be enlarged by less than a quorum. Now, what is that power? Being a power given, as it were, in derogation of the right of the House with a quorum, it must be construed exactly as it stands. What is that power? It is not a general power to compel the attendance of members. Nothing of that sort is given under the rules of this House to less than a quorum. Less than a quorum can only follow this rule. They can not go beyond it; they can not adopt any other method to compel the attendance of members. Whatever is prescribed in this rule is the cast-iron bound and controlling force of the House having less than a quorum. Now, what is the rule?

In the absence of a quorum—

And mark you, this is the only rule—

In the absence of a quorum, fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, and in all calls of the House the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; the doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested, wherever they may be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured; and the House shall determine upon what condition they shall be discharged.

There is a complete limitation of the power of less than a quorum. First, they are to receive the excuses of members; second, those that are not excused they may arrest. That is all we can do. Now, the gentleman proposes to do something else; and he undertakes to say he is acting under the authority of this House.

When you come to the question of the precedence of a motion to reconsider, that is too plain to require a word to be said about it. The rules of this House say that the right to make a motion to reconsider shall be interfered with only by a conference report (which this is not), or a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn (which this is not), or a motion to adjourn (which this is not), or a motion to take a recess (which this is not). If the gentleman undertakes to say that the action he now proposes is in the absence of a quorum, let me say to him that the last vote showed a quorum of this House; and we are acting with a quorum.

Mr. CATCHINGS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Does not my friend know that when the House is proceeding under a call it can not take a recess, it can not entertain a conference report, it can not do any of those other things to which the gentleman has alluded? That rule has no application whatever when the House is proceeding under a call.

Mr. REED. Now, the gentleman knows perfectly well that the last vote disclosed a quorum of this House, and we are not acting upon a no-quorum proposition.

Mr. CATCHINGS. We are acting under a call of the House.

Mr. REED. The call of the House has nothing to do with it. We have a quorum present; the last vote disclosed it. Does the gentleman mean to say that he can not now move to take a recess? I say he may.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let me ask my friend a question. He has asked me one; let me respond by asking him another.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Does the gentleman undertake to say that under the rules of the House it would be competent, without first dispensing with proceedings under the call, to proceed with the transaction of business?

Mr. REED. I think so; yet I frankly say to the gentleman that the custom of the House is otherwise.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Of course it is.

Mr. REED. I do not dispute facts——

Mr. CATCHINGS. So that the fact remains, as I stated, that while we are acting under a call of the House, whether a quorum be present or not, we can not do the things that the gentleman alluded to.

Mr. REED. But we can not by any possibility be precluded from a motion for reconsideration any more than from a motion to excuse a member. Then there is another point—this roll call which is had for excuses, and which is now proceeding, can not be interrupted by any motion except the business of excusing members; that is the only matter with which it can be interrupted. And if no motion to reconsider had been made, it would be the duty of the Speaker to go on with the question of excusing members, for that is the regular proceeding under a call of the House, and can no more be interrupted by these other proceedings than the roll call can be interrupted when the House has once ordered it. The resolution which the gentleman offers is predicated upon a result which has already been attained—namely, the presence of a quorum.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I only wish to say in response to the gentleman that it has always been held—the practice of the House has been uniform on this point—that when proceedings under a call of the House are pending the House need not order the arrest of absent members. It may pass a resolution directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to notify absent members by telegraph or otherwise that their attendance is requested. And it is too late now for my distinguished friend to indulge in a technical disquisition upon the exact terms of a rule which has existed always and has never had but one interpretation.

Mr. REED. The gentleman says this rule has never had but one interpretation. Will he cite any precedent to sustain his position?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I say it has never had but one interpretation. I say that this House, time and again, since I have been a member of it, has, when proceedings under a call were pending, adopted a resolution directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to notify absent members that their attendance is required.

Mr. REED. Has the gentleman ever before known an attempt made to interrupt a call for excuses in this way?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Well, that is not the point to which I was directing my remarks.

Mr. REED. Can the gentleman give us an instance of that?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not know that I can.

Mr. REED. I know that you can not.

Mr. CATCHINGS. But that is no answer to the question if I have the right to present the proposition. Now, what is the purpose of the second call of the roll when such proceedings as this are taking place? In accordance with the uniform practice of this House the second call is made for the purpose of enabling absent members, or their friends, to make sufficient excuse for their absence so as to avoid having their names included in the order of arrest directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms. But this is no such proceeding as that. This simply directs the Sergeant-at-Arms to notify absent members that their attendance is requested. That is the nature of the resolution I have submitted, and which I might as well have submitted, for the purpose of this argument, in the form of a motion. In other words, it might have been treated either as a resolution or as a motion for the purpose of this argument. Its substance is to determine its standing, and not its form under these circumstances.

But, as I stated at the outset, a careful reading of the rule will make it perfectly clear to any one that the last call is for the purpose of giving an opportunity for excuses to be made for absent members so as to prevent this arrest under an order that the House is contemplating making. I desire the Chair to follow me distinctly on this point:

The doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested, wherever they may be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms, etc.

It was deemed a wise and proper thing, and so we find this provision in the rule, that before the order should be issued directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest and bring before the bar of the House absent members, an opportunity should be given to them or some friend acting for them to make an excuse for their absence. Because it might be, if the excuse is deemed sufficient, that such member would be exempted from the order of arrest. That is the meaning of the rule, and no other can be attributed to it.

Now, it follows, unless the House is disposed to issue the order for the arrest of absent members, that there is no reason why the proceeding should be further pursued for excuses. The resolution is one which could only be acted upon under a call of the House. It does not propose the arrest of absent members. But while acting under a call of the House, the various propositions that my distinguished friend from Maine says would come ahead of this motion—such as the motion to reconsider—are such motions or propositions as can not in the very nature of things occur when the House is acting under a call. They are of a character which can only be considered by the House when it is not proceeding under a call. Hence his citation and his illustration have no application to the point here presented.

But, Mr. Speaker, it must follow in the very necessity of the case, and in the very nature of the proceeding, and in accordance with the necessary deductions to be drawn from the object of this rule, that the House may, when it does not propose to order the arrest of an absentee, make an order such as that contemplated in this resolution. Why, Mr. Speaker, to make my suggestion absolutely unanswerable, I will call my friend's attention to the fact that it has always been deemed in order, without calling upon any man for an excuse or without giving an opportunity for any man to make an excuse for an absent colleague, to at once dispense with further proceedings under a call.

Mr. REED. That is proper.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Why is that? The same reason applies in this case as in that; for when you move to dispense with further proceeding under a call, there is no danger of any absent member being arrested, and hence there is no necessity for an excuse. The same reasoning and the same principle applies here. My friend smiles, but he knows that my argument is absolutely unanswerable, I say again, because the parallel is perfect. And it has been repeatedly held that you may make a motion to dispense with further proceedings under a call without giving an opportunity for excuses for absentees; and the reason of that is patent upon the very face of the proposition, namely, that if you do not propose to arrest anybody, there is no occasion for an excuse to be made for his absence.

If nothing of a penal character is to happen to him, if he is not to be put under the ban in any shape, manner, or form, why should the House be burdened with excuses for his absence? And so it is with this resolution. Here is a proposition to dispense with further proceedings under this call. The resolution expressly declares that further proceedings under this call shall be dispensed with. But in addition to that it directs the Sergeant-at-Arms to notify absentees that their presence is desired. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I have said all I care to.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I want to be allowed a word in reply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Mississippi talks about this matter as if it was a matter of convenience to members to be allowed to be excused, and he says his argument is unanswerable, because you may dispense with proceedings under a call. Well, that argument is unanswerable. The only difficulty with it is that it has nothing to do with the present case.

I repeat, the Constitution of the United States permits the House to authorize less than a quorum to do a certain thing. The authorization of the House must be ample, and we, being less than a quorum, must follow that authorization. Now, this resolution is not within the competence of our power.

What are we allowed to do? First, there is the general expression that in the absence of a quorum members shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members. Then follows the specification of how we shall do it. There are not two distinct propositions, one conveying power and the other conveying power, but there is one conveying power and the other specifying how that power shall be exercised. How shall it be exercised? It shall be exercised by arresting members. What members? Those members who have not been excused. Consequently we must go through the process of making excuses for members before we can order the arrest of any of them.

Now, will you say to me that the words "compel the attendance of absent members" is a grant of power, and also a specification of what shall be done? If it is, then this resolution does not hit it. This is a resolution not to compel the attendance of members, but to coax the attendance of members.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let me ask my friend, if that should be sufficient, would not that be compelling their attendance, under a fair definition?

Mr. REED. Not a bit of it. That is no compulsion at all. It is simply a device to save postage stamps, simply a device to save the expense of telegraphing.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not know about that.

Mr. REED. It never was heard of before these two Congresses. We never heard of such a motion before. The motion was to order the arrest of members according to the provisions of the rule. Recollect first that it takes a whole quorum to do business, and there is only one exception, and that exception is to procure the attendance of members; and that less than a quorum can not do it outside of the authorization of a full House. Now, we have got the authorization of the full House, and what is it? It is that we shall arrest members that are unexcused. We have no right to excuse any others or to bring any others here. It is a solemn, serious proceeding to which this House proceeds to invite the Sergeant-at-Arms. To telegraph members is something undoubtedly that the full House can do, but it is something that less than a quorum can not do; and it can not be done under a call of the House. That seems to be exceedingly clear when you bear in mind that we must find the "word and place" in the book in undertaking to exercise any authority at all. The power of less than a quorum to compel the attendance of members is limited to specifications set out by the House, and we can not enlarge, we have no right to enlarge it.

Now, this whole difficulty arose from an endeavor to stretch this power beyond the meaning of the rule, and beyond the Constitution of the United States. We have actually to day 28 members of the House of Representatives that the Sergeant-at-Arms can arrest at his own sweet will—28 of them; and when you consider that some time in the history of the country may occur an opportunity when the Sergeant-at-Arms can make himself an exceedingly important factor with 28 under his control, you may judge we are right in entering this protest against such action. There is no use, gentlemen, of your proceeding in such a way. We know that with a majority of nearly a hundred you can do anything you desire. We know that you may smash every rule of parliamentary law, but gentlemen ought to be able to do their work, and do it according to the rules and according to parliamentary law; and they ought to be able to do it without turning this House into a justice of the peace shop, with $10 jurisdiction, less than one-half of what we have in the little State of Maine. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to take any part in this discussion. The gentleman from Maine has so frequently sought to put upon his head a crown of glory at the expense of this House, has so frequently sought to lecture it, has so frequently sought to chastise this House, that it does seem to me it is time to rebel, even to the youngest member of it. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that though I am a Democrat, yet when the gentleman counted a quorum of this House in 1890 I was in accord with him. [Applause on the Republican side.] I will strike you in the short ribs in a moment. [General laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I believed in it, because it sounded to me like a straightforward businesslike proposition; and I have always been a business man. I believed, sir, that when the Constitution said that you could call a man here, that it implied the power when he was here to recognize his presence and to make him act, to compel him to act, and to permit you to act in connection with him whether he was silent or spoke.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, so far from being the originator of the rule, stands to-day condemned for having made that just rule so obnoxious to a liberty-loving people that they have deserted it after he has so tyrannically exercised it. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Yes, Mr. Speaker, those gentlemen laugh when we denounce tyranny for it has no terrors for them. They hail it as the method by which they rose to power, and from whose throne in four or five States in the North they pretended to control the destinies of the entire nation. That is tyranny; and they love it. But, sir, what made that rule obnoxious was the fact that it was exercised in such a manner; through its methods there were enacted such iniquitous laws that the country felt that when so much power was intrusted in the hands of a man, liberty at least was unsafe, though business might be dispatched.

I stand to-day an advocate of that law, because I believe that while the Republican party, under the leadership of the gentleman, has made it a method of exercising tyranny, the Democratic party has such a sense of justice, of moderation, of prudence, as to use it in a way to show that it can be so used that liberty will not be unsafe and it can be used consistently with the expedition of business. The fact is that the gentleman used it to his discredit. It should be a crown of thorns upon his head instead of a crown of glory, because by his abuse he made a good rule so obnoxious to liberty-loving people that it can not again be adopted in a liberty-loving body.

For one, I resent the abuse of a good rule. For one, I deny to the gentleman the fathership of it. For one, I claim that he nailed it to the cross and crucified it by an unjust use of it, and we are tired of the crucifier claiming to be the father and the originator. He should be branded as its murderer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the argument upon the question of order which has just been made by the gentleman from Texas seems to be so conclusive, that I hope the Chair will now rule. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the Chair back for a single moment to the point of order that I made a while ago. My point is that the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] is a privileged motion under the rules, which can only be interfered with under the conditions stated in the rule which has been read, and that the resolution or motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], which the Chair stated he desired to have read solely for the purpose of determining whether it was one of the privileged motions that could take precedence of the motion to reconsider—that that motion is not in order; and I ask the Chair now to rule upon that point of order, which I renew after having heard read the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi. The point, I repeat is that the proposition presented by the gentleman from Mississippi is certainly not either one of the propositions or motions named in the rule as those which alone can take precedence of or displace a motion to reconsider a vote.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a word somewhat in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry. If I understand the proceedings here, the Committee on Rules have reported a proposition by which a quorum is sought to be secured where a quorum has not answered to their names. Their plan is the imposition of fines and penalties on acts which have no moral turpitude connected with them. That being the proposition of the Committee on Rules, if it is to be adopted at all, I think it should be made broader, and that we should have fines and penalties imposed on members who neglect to observe the rule against smoking, as well as on those who fail to answer to their names. [Laughter and applause.]

But, Mr. Speaker, it does not strike me that it belongs to a legislative body to attempt, by fines and penalties, to compel its members to comply with its rules. The majority have it in their power to neutralize the effect of the silence of a minority, and that is all they are entitled to. Count the members who sit in their seats and do not vote as part of the members for a quorum. It needs no penalties, no quarter-sessions proceedings to try members of the House, no making the Sergeant-at-Arms a constable to collect your fines and penalties. [Applause.] But if fines and penalties are to be adopted as the method to enforce a strict compliance with the rules, then every neglect to comply should be punished by a deduction of pay provided by law. Thus the majority of the House would convert itself into a court, judge, and jury, to determine for itself how much of a member's pay they would confiscate for any neglect to comply with a rule of the House.

Majorities are responsible for legislation, and have the right to adopt rules for the transaction of business. And it is perfectly easy for them to neutralize the effect of members neglecting to answer to their names when called. If present, they should be counted, for the evidence of sight is certainly as good as that of hearing. Majorities have the right to control legislative bodies. It belongs to them under the Constitution, and the only right guaranteed to the minority under the Constitution is, if its members are those specified, to have the yeas and nays recorded so as to show who is responsible for the action taken. That is all that the Constitution gives to a minority in our system of Government. The right of debate, the right of anything for the individual member is regulated by the rules which a legislative body chooses to adopt for its government, and in case members neglect to comply, have such rules as will neutralize the effect of such neglect. But to undertake to govern members in a legislative body by fines and penalties belongs to a quarter-sessions court and not to legislation. [Applause.]

Now, to come to the question that I desire to suggest, without trespassing on the time of the House. The proposition that came before us, if I understand our proceedings aright, was to adopt the resolution introduced by the Committee on Rules. On that question no quorum voted. Then a call of the House was ordered. The roll was called, and the Clerk commenced calling the names of absentees. On that second call excuses may be offered for absentee members; but before the absentee list was called through it was interrupted by a motion to excuse a particular member who had not answered to his name. That was voted upon, and after that vote a motion was made to reconsider the vote. Now, what motions can take precedence over that? What motion is high enough in privilege to displace that until the list of absentees is completed? One is the motion for an adjournment, which always takes precedence over other motions; the other to dispense with all proceedings under the call. The question now before the House, it seems to me, is, can this call of of the absentees be interrupted by any other business until it is finished?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair confesses that he has experienced some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion in this case. The motion to reconsider is a privileged motion; and the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, if held to be in order, would also be privileged. The question for the Chair is, which of these motions should be first submitted to the House. If the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi is in order and should prevail, it disposes of the motion to reconsider the vote on excusing the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], and it would also obviate any necessity for making a motion to excuse other gentlemen who failed to answer on a call of the House.

The language of the rule which has been cited is that—

> When a motion has been made and carried or lost, it shall be in order for any member of the majority, on the same or succeeding day, to move for the reconsideration thereof, and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions except the consideration of a conference report, a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, or to take a recess, etc.

The motion to reconsider, as will be seen, takes precedence over all other questions except those mentioned in the rule, and it may be made at any time during the day on which the vote sought to be reconsidered is taken or on the succeeding day. As the rule provides, a roll call may be interrupted in order that this motion to reconsider may be entered. But it does not follow that it is then to be disposed of. The Chair finds a decision—which must be the law—made in 1856, when the then Speaker decided (a question similar to this being pending) that under the rule it was in order at any time upon the same or the subsequent day to submit and have entered a motion to reconsider, but that it could not be considered while another question was before the House.

Without attempting to shut off the gentleman from Iowa, who made this motion to reconsider, the Chair recognized the gentleman from Mississippi, who was first on his feet and who first addressed the Chair; and he submitted a motion which he sent up. Now, when that motion is submitted, if it be in order, it is entitled, under this decision, to consideration; and the motion to reconsider, which may then be entered and which the House permits to interrupt the matter pending in order that it may be entered, is not to be considered, under the language of this decision of 1856, while the other question is before the House.

Now, this other question being before the House, the Chair thinks it must be first considered; and if the motion made by the gentleman from Mississippi be carried, it dispenses with the motion to excuse the gentleman from Iowa, because all gentlemen are excused under this motion, so that there would really be no necessity for voting upon a motion to reconsider, because the necessity for the original motion would be dispensed with by agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the Chair pardon an inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do I understand the Chair to hold that the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi is pending business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the Chair will review that decision for a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It is impossible for me to conceive how the Chair can hold that this proposition is business before the House in such a sense that it can not be displaced even by a motion to reconsider, when the very question at issue here is whether the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi shall be permitted to come before the House. The proposition was read simply for the information of the Chair and the House; it was read under protest. The business before the House was the excuse of the member from Iowa. We had voted upon that question; a member had changed his vote and had made a motion to reconsider. The gentleman from Mississippi then took the floor. The Chair saw fit, ignoring the gentleman from Iowa——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, the gentleman from Iowa was on the floor. I am not imputing any unfairness to the Chair, but the Chair saw fit, physically, to recognize for the moment the gentleman from Mississippi, who claimed that he had a right to the attention of the Chair. Thereupon at once the question arose whether the gentleman from Iowa or the gentleman from Mississippi represented that sort of a motion which entitled either of those gentleman to the recognition of the Chair. That the gentleman from Iowa represented a motion which clearly did entitle him to recognition no one disputes, unless the gentleman from Mississippi can claim that he was on the floor to make a motion which under the rules took precedence of that of the gentleman from Iowa.

Now, at that point the discussion arose. The business before the House, under the ruling which the Chair has read from the Journal—the pending business before the House, and the only business—was the determination of the question whether the House of Representatives would excuse the gentleman from Iowa. The House had not completed the determination of that question. We had gone through a roll call, the result of which had been announced; but a member of the House, in the exercise of his right under the rules, had risen to ask the second judgment of the House—its revisory action under the rules, which was to be secured through a motion to reconsider. The Chair himself, in stating the situation and reading the rule, recognized distinctly the fact that this right of the gentleman from Iowa, under the rules, could not be set aside by anything except some one of the matters named in the rule—a conference report, a motion to adjourn, a motion to fix the day to which the House will adjourn, or a motion to take a recess.

Now, I certainly hope the present occupant of the Chair, who I may properly say has made an enviable record for judicial fairness in the position which he now occupies, will not make what it seems to me will be the very lamentable mistake of undertaking to rule that the pending business before this House is not the clearly pending business on which we were engaged, but may be construed to be some business entirely extraneous to the pending business—extraneous business which the gentleman from Mississippi is endeavoring to interpose and obtrude here, but which is not yet before the House in any form that can make it the pending business—a proposition which was read for the information of the Speaker, which, as I understood (and I think everybody understood the same thing), was read for the sole purpose of disclosing whether the subject-matter of the resolution did embody one of the motions which alone can take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

And in defense of the fundamental principles of parliamentary law, in defense of what it seems to me lies at the very foundation of orderly procedure here, the right of this House to turn back and reconsider its action if it deems it proper to do so, a right absolutely essential to the orderly conduct of the legislative business of the House, I hope the Chair will reconsider clearly what is involved before ruling that a gentleman, because he is chairman of the Committee on Rules, or has a position on the committee, or whatever other position he may happen to occupy, or whatever be the stress or the exigency of the occasion, can come here and by endeavoring to take a gentleman off his feet who is standing here to submit a privileged motion, and after succeeding by the courtesy of the Chair in having the proposition read merely for the purpose of determining its character, and after determining its character and disclosing the fact that it contains no single solitary one of the exceptions given in the rule—I say under these circumstances I hope the Chair will not make any ruling that shall deprive not only the gentleman from Iowa of his right, but the House itself of an unquestioned right that it has under all of the rules and the practice of this body.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the question is as to the priority of two propositions, each of which the Chair has held to be in order. It raises an exceedingly interesting question in parliamentary proceedings, and, it seems to me, an entirely new one. It is important that it should be settled in accordance with the best judgment of the House. I therefore respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But the Chair has not completed its ruling.

Mr. LACEY. I thought the Chair had concluded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had not concluded its ruling.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chair had kindly permitted me to interrupt him for the purpose of calling attention to the exact condition in which we find ourselves.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had not quite concluded what it desired to say.

In reference to the argument of the gentleman from Maine, who has just taken his seat, the Chair desires to say that his reasoning would be good if his premises were good. But as the Chair understands the matter he goes too far——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman will permit the Chair to proceed. The gentleman from Maine, the Chair thinks, goes too far when he says that the motion to reconsider was the pending question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, unquestionably it was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Mississippi was made; and if the gentleman had proceeded in the usual course, and stated his motion as it was afterwards read from the desk, it would have been, in point of time, before the House long before the other was presented.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg to correct the Chair on this point——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair of course can not make a ruling consecutively unless he is permitted to state the grounds on which it is based.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg pardon of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that if the gentleman from Mississippi had proceeded in the usual way, and stated the motion that he desired to submit, it would have been more clearly understood that that was the pending business, if it was in order.

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi, instead of stating his motion, put it in writing and sent it to the desk.

Mr. CATCHINGS. In the usual way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was not stated by word of mouth. While that was being done—and while the gentleman from Mississippi had not used the words himself which his resolution embodied—the gentleman from Iowa made a motion to reconsider. That is to say, after the gentleman from Mississippi had been fully recognized, but before the motion that was submitted was read, the gentleman from Iowa moved to reconsider the vote just taken.

Now, if it was true that the gentleman, as stated by the gentleman from Maine, was cut off by the Chair, he would have the right to do that, for the Chair would have a right to recognize a member. The right of recognition is essentially in the Chair.

The vote was completed when the result of the roll call was announced. The gentleman from Maine—and in this respect the Chair thinks the gentleman is wrong in his premises—the gentleman from Maine assumes that the business before the House was the motion to excuse the gentleman from Iowa. In fact, the vote had been taken on that proposition, the result was announced to the House, and notwithstanding the fact that the motion to reconsider was in order it was not made.

It might have been made then or later in the day, or it might have been made to-morrow. Now——

Mr. BOUTELLE. But it was made, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But not until after other business intervened.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, I heard it made at the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair heard it, too; but heard it subsequently to the introduction of other business by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS]. [Cries of "No!" "No!" on the Republican side.] Unquestionably the Chair is right in that.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair allow me to clear that up?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. REED. The Chair of course will take the statement of a member——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will do that.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] rose in his seat, and so informed the Chair, and made the motion. The question of who happens to get the first breath in does not decide this proposition of recognition by the Chair. Why, just think of it. Can the Chair recollect a single instance where a motion to reconsider has been refused precedence, except upon the ground that it was to delay, or except upon the new ground that it was an intervening motion? He can not recollect a single instance where it was not allowed to come in, and our rules only allow four cases which are specified to take precedence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine will understand that the Chair is not refusing a motion to reconsider.

Mr. REED. The Chair is refusing the motion to reconsider when he refuses to recognize the gentleman who took his feet for the purpose of making the motion to reconsider. The Chair says that question was decided. It had to be decided before the motion to reconsider could be made. It could not be made until after the announcement by the Chair. So he had to wait until the Chair announced it, and then he stood right up in his place instantly and addressed the Chair, and moved to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And so, too, the gentleman from Mississippi rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. REED. But the gentleman from Iowa was entitled to precedence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon what principle?

Mr. REED. Upon the rule of the House of Representatives, which says that the gentleman from Iowa had the right to move to reconsider. In the first place, under general parliamentary law, the right to reconsider is instantaneous.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman said "the rule of the House," not parliamentary law. Where is the rule of the House that says the Chair must wait for a motion to reconsider before entertaining other business?

Mr. REED. When the gentleman rises and is on his feet instantly, there is no waiting for other business. It seems to me the Chair makes confusion in his mind by comparing cases where members did not instantly move to reconsider, but subsequently did it. In that case it is entitled to precedence after the business which is interrupted has been concluded. But where a gentleman, directly after the vote is announced, stands up and moves to reconsider, why it has always been his right, and the Chair can not remember an instance since he was here, nor an instance in the whole history of the Congress of the United States, where the contrary was held. We can not afford to have too much new law made.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I only want to say one word——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would have more hesitancy——

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. REED. Under the head of reconsideration, where we get our right, the rule of the House says:

> When a motion has been made and carried or lost, it shall be in order for any member of the majority, on the same or succeeding day, to move for the reconsideration thereof, and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions.

And so forth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the rule

Mr. CATCHINGS. I wish to say one word with reference to the facts. I do not care to argue the law of this case any more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I wish to say that when the Chair had announced the result of the vote on the call of the yeas and nays I rose in my seat with a written resolution, and pursuing the usual parliamentary method of presenting a motion or resolution in writing, I sent it to the desk to be read. I could not have done otherwise.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after that had been done, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] rose and made his motion to reconsider. The Chair had distinctly recognized my motion, and it was the pending business at the time the motion to reconsider was made. It is true he had a right to make a motion to reconsider; but the Chair is not compelled to wait to see if a gentleman desires to move to reconsider for, non constat, such a motion might never be made. And, therefore, after the vote is announced on the roll call, it is the business of the Chair, not merely the will of the Chair, but it is the business of the Chair, to recognize gentlemen who desire to call up business before the House that is in order. The Chair could not have known at the time he recognized me to make the motion that anybody was going to make a motion to reconsider.

Mr. REED. There is no suggestion of the question as to whether the Chair should wait for a motion. The gentleman undertakes to speak of what would happen in a case where a member did not make a motion, and as to whether the Chair should wait for a motion. Certainly not. But in this case the gentleman from Iowa made it instantly, and it is not a question of the right of recognition by the Chair. It is a question of the right of a member to his motion to reconsider.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The point of order is this. As I understand the situation, a point of order has been submitted to the Chair and the Chair has decided it. Now, is there no end to the debate upon it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I make the point of order that it is not in order to discuss a matter which has been decided.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The Chair has not decided.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can only entertain one point of order at a time. The present occupant of the chair is not inclined, being only temporarily in the chair, to undertake to say too hurriedly that members of the House who desire to submit their views shall not do so upon a parliamentary question which is more or less new. The Chair will allow a reasonable indulgence to gentlemen to state their views, because, being temporarily in the chair, and only the temporary organ of the House, he would not feel disposed to override any well-established precedent and authority; and therefore would indulge members to a greater extent than he might possibly if he were the permanent occupant of the chair.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chair has, I think, by inadvertence, stated that my premises were not sound when he stated that I had based my argument upon the allegation that the business before the House was the motion of the gentleman from Iowa. That was not exactly technically accurate. I hold that the business before the House, upon which the House was engaged, and which it had not completed, was the business of excusing the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]. Now, the question as to what business was pending before the House, must, of course, refer to the moment of time that the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Iowa were claiming recognition of the Chair. That is the time to which our attention is directed; and the question as to what business is in order is pertinently answered by ascertaining what took place at that precise moment of time, because the question before the Speaker was whether he should recognize one gentleman or another to bring up a matter of business.

Now, at the time that the gentleman from Mississippi was on the floor and recognized by the Chair, at the same time the gentleman from Iowa was endeavoring to get recognition for a motion to reconsider the business done, and the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi could not by any stretch of imagination be assumed to be before this House, because nobody knew it was. The gentleman had not stated what it was. He had not made any motion. He had not indicated the scope of the proposition he was about to submit, and, therefore, I was entirely correct in saying that the business before the House at the time this question addressed itself to the Chair for decision was nothing but the determination of the question in regard to the excuse of the gentleman from Iowa. Everybody recognizes that; and this matter of the gentleman from Mississippi has only been interpolated since.

It came in during the controversy and discussion, and it was read at the Clerk's desk simply as a matter of information. So that the determination of the Chair, as to the duty of the Chair to recognize the motion offered by the gentleman from Iowa, to reconsider the vote just taken, or to recognize the gentleman from Mississippi in regard to some paper, the nature of which had not been disclosed, of course can not be to pass upon any proposition in that measure, because nobody knew what was in the paper sent up by the gentleman from Mississippi. The motion of the gentleman from Iowa was the pending business at the time when the Chair recognized the gentleman from Mississippi, and, as I believe, the Chair was withholding rightful recognition from the gentleman from Iowa, because this business of the gentleman from Mississippi was not before the House. It was not pending anywhere. It was simply a personal proposition that he had evolved and was endeavoring to get before the House.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine is not very accurate in his statement as to what has transpired. Now, what was the question under consideration? It was a question as to whether a certain gentleman on the other side should be excused. A vote was taken and it was decided that he should not be excused; whereupon the gentleman from Mississippi, being recognized by the Chair—and about that there can be no dispute—sent a proposition in writing to the Chair, which was a larger proposition than the proposition which was under consideration, the excuse of an individual member, and proposed to excuse all members from arrest if his resolution were adopted.

The gentleman says it was not before the House. It was sent to the House in the ordinary form in which every resolution is sent, in which every motion is sent. The Speaker frequently requires gentlemen to reduce their propositions to writing. The gentleman from Mississippi took the precaution to reduce his resolution to writing, and he was recognized by the Chair; whereupon the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] said that he made a motion to reconsider. As the Speaker has very properly said, he had the right to make the motion to reconsider, and the right is secured to every member under the rule, for it provides that a member may offer a motion to reconsider upon the day upon which the measure is passed or on the subsequent day, and it may be entered upon the Journal; but that can not interfere with the larger motion presented by my colleague from Mississippi for the adoption of the House, and which, if adopted, will not only excuse that individual member whose case was under consideration, but excuse from arrest every member.

I say therefore that the Chair in indicating that it is his purpose to recognize the right of the gentleman from Mississippi to make that motion, which excuses the member whose name has been mentioned here and for whom an excuse has been requested, and dispenses with the seriatim propositions which it is no doubt the purpose of the gentleman from Maine and others to make, and to have a roll call on the excusing of every member who fails to answer to his name—the Chair, I say, in indicating that it is his purpose to recognize the right of my colleague from Mississippi to make that motion is ruling in accordance with parliamentary law and the proper course of proceeding here.

My colleague from Mississippi, seeing that a separate motion mig ht be made on excusing every gentleman who failed to answer to his name, in troduces this larger proposition, which includes the minor, and which does not exclude the question of excusing the gentleman on whose case it has been moved to reconsider the vote, because it proposes to excuse him and every member who is absent by the adoption of a proposition which shall not make it necessary to issue an order for the arrest either of the member specified or of other gentlemen for whom excuses may be asked. I repeat, sir, the indication which the Chair has given as to his conclusion upon this question is so evidently right and proper and so entirely in the interest of the transaction of business, that it ought not to be opposed by anybody on either side of the House who professors to be in favor of doing business here. The object of my colleague from Mississippi is, by this general proposition, to excuse all members who are absent, and thereby to avoid the necessity of embracing their names in any order of arrest which may be given to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, this question is very plain. The Chair was announcing the result of a vote. Two gentlemen were on their feet, ready, the instant the vote was announced, to demand the attention of the Chair, and submit motions. One of those gentlemen was the member from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], who signified his intention to make a motion to reconsider. He was standing just where I stand now, and he addressed the Chair the instant it was possible for him to do so. If he did not make that motion in time, he never could make the motion in time. The other was the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], who desired to offer a resolution, and I am obliged to my distinguished friend, who has just taken his seat [Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi], for disclosing the motive which his colleague had in offering that resolution. That motive, he says, was to cut off the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] from the right to move to reconsider.

Now, how can the Speaker say that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] was on the floor first on that occasion? How can the Speaker say that the gentleman from Iowa was not on the floor just as soon as the gentleman from Mississippi? It seems to be a simple matter of favoritism and a very plain violation of the rule. I understood the Speaker to say that if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] had made his motion first it would have been in order, and I undertake to say that unless the gentleman from Iowa did make his motion so as to be in order it would be utterly impossible for him or anybody else to make such a motion in order with the present Speaker [Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee] in the chair, if he chose to recognize somebody else to make some other motion intended to head off the motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BURROWS. Just one word, Mr. Speaker. The rule has already been referred to which provides that—

When a motion has been made and carried or lost, it shall be in order for any member of the majority on the same or succeeding day to move for the reconsideration thereof, and such motion shall take precedence of all other motions except the motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, conference reports, and so on.

A proceeding similar to this arose some years ago in the House of Representatives, and the decision of the Chair at that time may throw some light upon the pending question. The House found itself without a quorum and a motion to adjourn was made and lost. Then Mr. McKay offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That all members now absent, except such as have been excused, be required, at the meeting of the House on to-morrow morning, to give excuses for their absence at this time; and it shall be the duty of the Clerk to enter their names on the Journal.

A point of order was made against that resolution, and the Speaker held that it was not in order; that, there being no quorum present, it was not in order to make an order that members should appear the next day. An appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair, and the House, in the anxiety and heat which sometimes prevailed in the earlier days of the Republic, overruled the decision of the Chair, and held that it was in order; so the question was put and the resolution adopted. The next day some question arose about the Journal, which was finally adjusted, and then Mr. Dromgoole moved to reconsider the vote of the day previous, agreeing to the resolution offered by Mr. McKay during the proceeding upon the call of the House, which resolution was as follows [reciting the resolution]. Pending that proposition to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted a Mr. Brown, in order to get rid of the whole subject, moved to rescind the resolution.

In the case now pending we have a proposition to excuse a member. A motion is made to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to excuse him, and pending that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] offers a resolution to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, so as to avoid the necessity of a vote on the motion to reconsider. In this case to which I am referring Mr. Brown moved to rescind the resolution for the sole purpose of getting rid of the question of reconsidering the vote had on the preceding day. The Speaker held that under the rule of the House declaring that a motion to reconsider shall take precedence of all other motions except a motion to adjourn, etc., the motion to reconsider was first in order and must be put.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Who was the Speaker?

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. John Davis, of Indiana, was the Speaker of the House at the time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Does my friend from Michigan seriously contend that there is any parallel between a motion to rescind a given vote and a motion to dispense with all proceedings under the call?

Mr. BURROWS. Why, the very object of dispensing with all proceedings under the call is to get rid of the proceeding. Here was a motion to rescind a proposition upon which a motion was entered to reconsider. Now, in order to avoid the effect of the motion to reconsider, it was proposed to rescind the original proposition. The two cases are "on all fours" with each other.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Why, Mr. Speaker, the motion to rescind was equivalent to the motion to reconsider. That was the very purpose of it.

Mr. REED. Why, the gentleman from Mississippi and his colleague have argued the question on the ground that his motion is a larger measure, which dispenses with the other. Here is a motion which is still larger; and if a larger motion can have the effect for which the gentleman contends, a still larger one must have that effect.

Mr. CATCHINGS. In order to make a parallel——

Mr. BURROWS. Let me say this to my friend. Upon certain resolutions passed by the House certain proceedings were had; and upon one of those resolutions it was proposed to reconsider the action of the House. Now, in order to take a larger view of the matter, as suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, and to get in a resolution which would have precedence of the other, it was proposed to wipe out the resolution which laid the foundation for the proceeding.

Mr. CATCHINGS. But my friend is so good a parliamentarian that he must know the only way for the House to rescind a resolution would be to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted.

Mr. REED. Not at all.

Mr. BURROWS. This was a proposition to rescind, to wipe out the original resolution. But the gist of the matter is that the Speaker held that in the face of such a proposition the motion to reconsider, being first in order under the rules, must be first put.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Having been first made, as the Chair understands.

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, I suppose there is no contest as to who was first entitled here to recognition.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Iowa stood here on his feet——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands, in that case the motion to reconsider was first made.

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly; and, as I understand it, was first made here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. If the gentleman from Maine has any additional argument to submit, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understood the Chair to address an inquiry to the gentleman from Michigan in regard to the action of the gentleman from Iowa. I wish to say that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] stated to me that the gentleman from Iowa not only made the motion, but the Chair had at first recognized him, or said "The gentleman from Iowa," and then had his attention diverted to the gentleman from Mississippi. I think that is a statement of the facts.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The record of the proceedings does not sustain that statement.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think what I have stated is a pertinent fact for the Chair to understand; for I presume the Chair will accept the statement of the gentleman from Missouri in its full purport.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The gentleman from Missouri was mistaken; that is all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is quite sure he recognized the gentleman from Mississippi, and so stated immediately thereafter, when the matter was fresh in his mind. The Chair is quite positive on that point. The Chair is now ready to rule.

Mr. WELLS. May I interject just a word?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WELLS. This appears to have become a question of veracity between the Chair and gentlemen of the opposition. I think there are gentlemen on this side of the House who will sustain the Chair in the position that he apparently intends to take; and we ask that he take it immediately.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already indicated the ruling he intended to make in this matter; but he has indulged gentlemen in their statements, trusting that possibly additional light might be thrown on the question.

The Chair adheres to the decision he has already made; and he does so with the less reluctance because no possible injury can come from this view of the case. The motion to reconsider, if now entertained and voted upon, would only accomplish that which the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi will accomplish. The question, therefore, is upon the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, unless some gentleman appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LACEY. I appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa states that he desires to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to offer an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That question is not now before the House. The question is on the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the gentleman from Mississippi moves to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion to lay the appeal on the table the gentleman from South Dakota moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. PICKLER. I call for a division.

The question was again taken; and there were—ayes 62, noes 132.

Mr. PICKLER. I demand tellers on the vote.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution I had read at the desk.

Mr. PICKLER. It is now nearly 5 o'clock, and I move that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 52, noes 112.

Mr. PICKLER. Let us have tellers.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let us have tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE and Mr. OUTHWAITE were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 60.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 51, nays 146, not voting 156; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I ask for a recapitulation of the vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The Clerk will recapitulate the vote.

The Clerk recapitulated the names of those voting.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I renew my demand for the previous question.

Mr. REED (speaking at the same time). I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] for the previous question.

Mr. REED. But I have moved to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That motion can not be made pending a demand for the previous question upon the resolution. I had moved that the previous question be ordered on the resolution which has been read. Pending that the motion to adjourn was made. The motion to adjourn having been voted down, the question recurs upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. REED. I think the motion must be in order to dispense with all further proceedings under the call. That motion had been made——

Mr. CATCHINGS. This very resolution itself embraces a proposition to dispense with further proceedings.

Mr. REED. But that resolution presents that proposition, and something else, and it seems to me a motion to dispense with all further proceedings under the call has priority over any other motion. That is my impression.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The resolution pending comprehends a proposition to dispense with all further proceedings.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I move that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio on the question involved.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The motion pending, on which the previous question is demanded, comprehends a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call. To entertain now the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] would be simply to permit a motion to amend a motion on which the previous question has been demanded, by striking out a portion of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not had an opportunity to read the resolution, and will examine it, with the indulgence of the House.

Mr. REED. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. The Chair will forgive me for being a little confused. It is so unusual to have a hearing that I am a little disturbed by it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. REED. I desire to say to the Speaker that it seems to me that the fact that the gentleman has put some other matters in his original resolution, besides dispensing with further proceedings under the call, does not prevent a motion for the entire discharge of the call. Whenever there is a call of the House a motion to adjourn is in order, and a motion to dispense with further proceedings, pure and simple, must be in order, because the prior occupant of the chair (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee) decided that this motion took precedence of even a motion to reconsider, upon the ground that, incidentally, it dispenses with all proceedings whatever under the call.

That is, we were proceeding under the provision of the rule by which members may be excused. Thereupon this proposition was presented, and upon the ground that it dispenses with further proceeding, the Chair held that it obviated the necessity for a reconsideration, because if it was carried it excused the member, and if it was not carried, then the question would come up upon the original motion to reconsider. Now, the proposition which I make is still broader than that which is made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS]. It provides specifically that all proceedings shall be dispensed with, and if all proceedings are dispensed with, it obviates the necessity of the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS]. I am sure the wisdom of that must be recognized by the gentleman from Mississippi. If his motion can stop proceedings on the ground that it partially discontinues, mine must have a superiority over his, because it wholly discontinues; that is, if there is anything in logic. I ought to add, Mr. Speaker, that the last vote showed a quorum of the House present.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, it was ruled in the Forty-fourth Congress as follows:

> A motion to dispense with proceedings under the call is not in order pending the motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody absent members.

The reason for that is manifest. If that motion could be allowable, the House might alternate forever between a motion to adjourn and a motion to dispense with proceedings under the call, and meantime leave pending a motion for the arrest of absent members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was some confusion in the Hall, and if the gentleman will read the authority again, the Chair will be obliged to him.

Mr. CATCHINGS (reading)—

> A motion to dispense with proceedings under the call is not in order pending the motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody absent members.

And, as I stated, there is an excellent reason for that; because if, pending a motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody absent members, a motion can be made that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, we would be in such an attitude that a motion to adjourn might be alternated indefinitely with a motion to dispense with further proceedings, leaving open all the time the power to secure a quorum by the arrest of absent members. The principle seems to be clear and unanswerable.

Mr. REED. That gives me an opportunity to present a second point, to which I desire to call attention. It is perfectly true that it has been decided, as read by the gentleman from the Digest, that is I presume it is so; but we are proceeding under the Constitution of the United States and under the rules of the House. The rules of the House provide that a minority may order the arrest of members. They do not provide that they may send telegrams to them; and this is a proposition to send telegrams to members, and not a proposition to arrest them. Clearly, if we are proceeding under a call of the House, we are entirely out of our jurisdiction, though it has already been shown by a vote that there is a quorum here, and it can be done, because we have a quorum. So that it is not necessary to argue that point.

But taking it for granted that we are acting under a call of the House, with less than a quorum endeavoring to obtain the presence of members. The rules of the House prescribe specifically what course we shall pursue in order to obtain the attendance of members. It is by "arrest," and not a proceeding of this kind. This is not a proposition to compel the attendance of members by arresting them, as required by the rules of the House. The rules of the House are the sole authorization under the Constitution for the action of the minority. That being the case, a motion to dispense with further proceedings must take precedence of this, notwithstanding the fact that if the gentleman from Mississippi had made a proper motion; that is, a motion to arrest members and bring them here, my motion would not be admissible; but it is admissible now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). With the indulgence of the House, the Chair will have read the resolution under which the action proposed is to be taken.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Unless the Chair is ready to rule, I desire to say a word or two.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule, but will hear any further statement the gentleman desires to make.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I simply desire to say that the gentleman from Maine has repeated the argument that he made earlier, by which he seeks to maintain that the word "compel," in connection with obtaining the attendance of absent members, means necessarily arrest.

Mr. REED. That is what the rule says.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The rule does not state that.

Mr. REED. Read it and see.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The rule says:

> In the absence of a quorum, fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. REED. Read on.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That is a substantive feature of the rule.

Mr. REED. Read the rest of it.

Mr. CATCHINGS. It has been read forty times to-day.

Mr. REED. Read the whole of it.

Mr. CATCHINGS. If it will oblige the gentleman, I will read the whole of it, though it does not have any relation to what I have to say.

Mr. REED. Thank you.

Mr. CATCHINGS (reading):

> In the absence of a quorum, fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there isone, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of a bsent members.

Now, that is a substantive feature of the rule.

Mr. REED. Read the rest.

Mr. CATCHINGS (continuing reading):

> And in all calls of the House, the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; the doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may—> by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested wherever they may be found.

Now, suppose the House desires to compel the attendance of members, but does not desire to arrest them. The word "compel" is used in this rule in the sense of securing or procuring. Now, if in the judgment of the House the simple revocation of leaves of absence will secure the attendance of absent members, the House can pause there; but if the House thinks that a formal summons in the shape of a telegram will compel or secure the attendance of absent members, the House can pause there. There is nothing in the rule which can justify the argument of the gentleman from Maine that the word "compel" means absolutely the arrest and forceful bringing to the bar of this House of absent members. So that, Mr. Speaker, the resolution itself looks to compelling the attendance of members, first, by revoking the leaves of absence; and, secondly, by formally summoning them to attend the sessions of this House by telegram.

Mr. REED. I wish now to call attention to one of the propositions there, and that is the revocation of the leaves of absence. The proposition which is now submitted to the House is in order to find a quorum, to revoke leaves of absence granted by the full House. That is to be done without the authorization of any rule of the House, and when the Constitution provides that nothing less than a quorum shall act except to compel the attendance of members, and then only as authorized by the rules of the House. Now, let me for example——

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. MCMILLIN]. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine that the last vote showed the presence of a quorum.

Mr. REED. Then, what I am saying will not be wasted, because I will submit another proposition later. The Constitution of the United States provides that a House without a quorum is absolutely powerless; it can do nothing; and if the House, before it established any rules, or before it established any rules with regard to compelling the attendance of members, should find itself without a quorum, it would be absolutely powerless under the Constitution to compel the attendance of a quorum.

It is not under any general law, or under the Constitution either, that less than a quorum can compel the attendance of absentees. The Constitution provides that the House may empower less than a quorum to compel the attendance of a quorum; but, without that authorization, less than a quorum would be powerless. Consequently less than a quorum have got to be governed by the authorization of the House just as it stands. They can not increase their own power, and that power is specifically granted and the grant declares that the thing shall be done by the arrest of those members who have not been excused and have not answered on the roll call of the House. But here we have a proposition to revoke leaves of absence granted by the House itself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The Chair is ready to rule. On a yea-and-nay vote upon a question pending before the House no quorum responded. Thereupon there was a call of the House. Then the doors were closed, and the Clerk proceeded to call the names of those who had not responded on the first call for excuses. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] has presented the resolution which has just been read to the House, seeking to procure the attendance of a quorum. Pending that, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] moves to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, and insists that it takes precedence of the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi. The Chair will have read the ruling the substance of which has been read from the Digest, which will shed light upon this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. Morrison that the Speaker pro tempore issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody and bring to the bar of the House all members absent without leave;

Pending which,

Mr. HOAR moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with; when,

The Speaker pro tempore held that the only motion now in order was the motion that a warrant issue to the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody and bring to the bar of the House all members absent without its leave.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. HOAR appealed.

Pending which,

Mr. Clymer moved that the motion be laid on the table——

Mr. REED. That decision, Mr. Speaker, is that that is the only motion that is admissible, and that, as I have said, is a motion to arrest absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will come to that later. The Clerk will now read the result of the vote on the appeal.

The Clerk read as follows:

And, the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 19, not voting 185.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Now, the gentleman from Maine insists that there can be no revocation of leaves of absence by less than a quorum——

Mr. REED. Unless accompanied by a motion to arrest after the roll call has been had; which the Chair will find to have been the proceeding in the case last cited. He will find that thus the roll call was gone through and excuses offered, and then an order of arrest made.

Mr. FIELDER. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that that is simply a qualification.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have read the ruling of Mr. Speaker Carlisle.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion to revoke leaves of absence previously granted is in order pending a call of the House, and may be determined by less than a quorum, being a proceeding to compel attendance of absent members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Whilst this is not a proposition exactly like the one the ruling upon which has just been read, the Chair thinks it is that kind of proceeding which is contemplated under the Constitution, by which less than a quorum is permitted to compel or procure the presence of absent members. The Chair therefore holds that the ruling which has been read applies to it by analogy, and consequently that the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] is first in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, would the Chair hold that a composite proposition like that of the gentleman from Mississippi——

[Loud cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" and disorder in the Hall.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maine state his question briefly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do I understand the Chair to hold that a composite proposition like that of the gentleman from Mississippi, which embodies a number of distinct features, would take precedence at such a juncture as this over the distinct proposition or motion of my colleague [Mr. REED] to dispense with all further proceedings under the call?

It is easily understood that a proposition like this, embracing a number of different features, might not commend itself to the House, while the House might very naturally be desirous of dispensing with all further proceedings under the call. It seems to me, therefore, that the ordinary motion, the motion which has always been regarded as the one which naturally comes up when a quorum has exhibited itself, ought to take precedence over a composite proposition like that of the gentleman from Mississippi, involving a number of different provisions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not insist that this is in every respect a similar proceeding to the one which was ruled upon in the case cited. That was a proposition to arrest members and bring them to the bar of the House. But the Chair thinks that the House under the Constitution has a right to resort to any lawful means which its discretion may approve to procure the attendance of members; that this is such a proceeding, and that the ruling which has been referred to on an analogous case is applicable to this. That is the ground of the ruling of the Chair. The resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi seeks to procure the attendance of members.

The question is on the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, that is certainly a mistake.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was so informed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, no. The pending question is the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the motion was originally made, but is now informed by the Clerk that the question is on ordering the previous question on the resolution.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were, on a division—ayes 125, noes 6.

Mr. REED. Tellers.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has there been any intervening business since that question was voted upon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the business which has been transacted since the motion to adjourn is such business as will enable that motion to be entertained again. There was a point of order made against the resolution. It was fully discussed; the Chair ruled on the point, and thinks that was clearly intervening business.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were, on a division—ayes 69, noes 125.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering tellers.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 62, nays 134, not voting 157; as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi with Mr. PICKLER.

Mr. SIBLEY with Mr. MOON.

Mr. BUNN with Mr. SMITH of Illinois.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland with Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois.

Mr. PAGE with Mr. REYBURN.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. REED. No quorum, Mr. Speaker, has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a call of the House it does not require a quorum.

Mr. REED. I desire to present this proposition to the Chair very briefly——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. REED. It is this, that the Constitution of the United States only authorizes the House of Representatives to allow a minority to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide. No such proceeding as is attempted here to be done is provided for by the rules of the House.

The Chair will perceive, if he will have the kindness to refer to the Constitution on page 5—and I will be very brief——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. REED. The Chair will perceive that the House itself is not authorized to empower a minority to compel the attendance of members generally. That is, the House has not the power to authorize less than a quorum to make choice of methods whereby the attendance of absent members shall be compelled. But, on the contrary, it says that the minority may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members "in such manner and under such penalties as each House may prescribe."

The power of the House itself, then, is limited. It has got to prescribe the method; and that clause in the rule which says that fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there be one, may compel the attendance of members, is followed by a provision stating the manner and under what penalties it may be done. It is not a general power to compel. It is the duty of the House to prescribe the manner. The only way the House has prescribed the manner is the rule which provides for the arrest of absent members. This is a proposition outside of the rule—the proposition here is to compel the attendance of members in a manner not provided in the rule; and it is not a power that has been conferred on less than a quorum.

In other words, the House can not permit less than a quorum to choose its methods. It can not permit it if it would, and it has not attempted to permit it. Therefore a resolution revoking leaves of absence which have been granted by the full House, and prescribing certain methods which, if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] be correct, will compel attendance, inasmuch as it prescribes methods which are not authorized by the House, it must take a quorum to do it. I do not know how you gentlemen feel about this subject, but it is a very plain matter of law. (Cries of "Rule!" Rule!" on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee). The Chair understands that it has been uniformly held by all the occupants of the chair, both temporary and permanent, that a motion to produce or compel the attendance of a quorum may be adopted without the presence of a quorum, and the Chair thinks that this order is clearly within the rule, and that it does not require a quorum.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All the Speakers of the House have so held, and the Chair will not undertake to limit it. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 101.

Accordingly, the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS].

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The resolution dispenses with further proceedings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Further proceedings under the call are now dispensed with. The doors will be opened.

Mr. CATCHINGS. And now, Mr. Speaker, I move——

Mr. BOUTELLE. How many of these——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CATCHINGS. That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BURROWS. Just a moment. I wish to know whether the report of the Committee on Rules will be printed in the RECORD? I should like to have it printed there.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report was read, as the Chair is informed, and will be printed in the RECORD. Before submitting the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi the Chair will, if there be no objection, submit several requests for leave of absence.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted

To Mr. ENLOE, for to-day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WOLVERTON, for this day, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. GEISSENHAINER, for one week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GARDNER, for five days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. DURBOROW, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. SHELL, for one week, on account of sickness.

Mr. BLAND. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. FYAN, who is sick and unable to attend the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] asks that the name of his colleague, Mr. FYAN, be added to the list of those to whom leaves of absence is granted. In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to ask what effect upon the resolution just adopted the adjournment of the House will have?

Mr. REED. If we adjourn, do not all the proceedings fall?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion is made that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BOUTELLE. A motion is made that the House do now adjourn, and we have just adopted a resolution instructing the Sergeant at Arms to send telegrams, etc. My question is this: Does not that resolution fall the moment the House adjourns?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not called upon to decide that question now, and will not do it, because that question does not now arise.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Has the Chair any doubt about it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The motion of Mr. CATCHINGS was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The motion was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill is open to amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is open to amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to make a short explanation and ask unanimous consent to have an amendment agreed to. On page 3, after line 13, I move to insert:

MINTS AND ASSAY OFFICES.

Mint at Philadelphia: For wages of workmen and adjusters, $46,000.

I will read the letter that has just come from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to this matter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 13, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for consideration in connection with the urgency deficiency bill now pending in the Senate (H. R. 6556), a communication from the Director of the Mint of this date, setting forth the necessity for an appropriation of $46,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for wages of workmen, mint at Philadelphia, for the current fiscal year.

The very large coinage operations at this mint renders this additional appropriation absolutely necessary.

Respectfully yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate.

The Director of the Mint says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., April 13, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to request that you will procure an appropriation of $46,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for wages of workmen at the mint of the United States at Philadelphia for the current fiscal year.

In explanation, I would say that the appropriation of this amount is necessary in order to continue coinage operations at that institution during the remainder of the current fiscal year. The cause of the deficiency in the appropriation for wages of workmen is due solely to the large coinage of gold it was required to execute to meet the demands of the Treasury, and to do this it was not only necessary to employ additional workmen and adjusters, but to work a large portion of the force over time.

The amount of gold coined at the mint at Philadelphia from July 1, 1893, to date has been $61,517,485. In addition to this, there has been coined in subsidiary silver $1,289,000 and in minor coins $704,396.

There is now on hand at the mint at Philadelphia and the New York assay office gold bullion approximating $50,000,000. Of this amount it is desirable to convert into coin before the close of the fiscal year not less than $20,000,000, making the aggregate gold coinage of the mint at Philadelphia for the year about $82,000,000, which will be the largest coinage ever executed at any mint of the United States in any one year.

Respectfully yours,

R. E. PRESTON,
Director of the Mint.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, the bill I understand is yet open to amendment, and that of course permits the reconsideration of any action of the Senate as in Committee of the Whole upon the bill, or any action of the Senate itself since the bill was reported to the Senate.

I was addressing myself yesterday when adjournment came, to the matter of the printing and issuing of the two final reports upon Indians compiled by Special Agent Donaldson. This matter was ready many months ago. There have been published several bulletins, but the important parts of the work, the work upon the Five Civilized Tribes and the report upon Indians Taxed and not Taxed, which makes the final volume, has been in the hands of the printer, in type and electrotyped, for many months. Not only that, but both the publications not yet issued were approved by Superintendent Porter before he left the Census Office, and I take it that they are not now subject to revision unless the action of the predecessor of Commissioner Wright had been induced by fraud, misrepresentation, or some unfairness that should cause his action to be set aside.

It is claimed that there are certain illustrations in these two final publications upon which a gentleman named Lummis, in California, has a copyright. The fact is, and it will appear conclusively, from matter I have before me which I shall read in a moment, that any plates or illustrations upon which this gentleman has a copyright were published in the work I have here in hand, known as the Extra Census Bulletin on the Moqui-Pueblo Indians of Arizona. That work was issued while Superintendent Porter was in charge of the office. There is no claim on the part of any person that the illustrations as to the Five Civilized Tribes and the Indians Taxed and not Taxed, are copyrighted or are to be used in violation of copyright; so that that need not enter into consideration in the matter of the publication of the two works which are not yet published. A revision of them that shall change them materially and present a new form of publication would probably cost more than it would cost to take the matter that is now in hand and put it upon the press and issue it.

As to the character of this work, I started yesterday when interrupted to read a letter directed to Agent Donaldson by Mr. Porter, late Superintendent of the Census. He goes on to say:

It is an old saying, "that the affections of the human heart can not be measured by a 2-foot rule." So it is with the Report on the Condition of the Indian Tribes of the United States—it can not be gauged from the standpoint of a tabular statement or by the narrow confines of an "iron-clad schedule." As I said in the opening sentence of my letter of transmittal—

Referring to his letter of transmittal to the Secretary of the Treasury—

"the report on the Indian is unique;" there is nothing like it "in the census."

There can be nothing like it upon any other subject treated upon in the census, because the provision of the statute with reference to the Indian was different in its language from that on any other subject. Upon no other subject-matter was it demanded that there should be a presentation of the condition of the Indian and an opinion as to what was best for him.

There is no rule which can be applied to it except that which you have worked out so admirably, namely, "Secure all data possible and make a picture of the Indian as he exists to-day." Stand up and fight for your report and you will have behind you the intelligent people of both parties; pay no attention to the people who with shears will cut down the canvas which an artist has devoted years of his life in painting to fit a frame. My suggestion is and always has been on the Indian report, make the frame bigger.

I have here some of the advance sheets of the final report known as the Report on Indians Taxed and not Taxed. This is the letter of transmittal of the 5th of June, written by Superintendent Porter to Hon. Hoke Smith, the Secretary of the Interior, referred to by him, in which he says:

This report upon Indians is unique.

He further goes on to say:

The office was fortunate in securing the services of Mr. Thomas Donaldson, of Philadelphia, Pa., abundantly equipped by knowledge of his subject, habit of indefatigable industry, and literary skill to do justice to this very complex and important subject. Mr. Donaldson has secured the cooperation of Indian tribal authorities, and has utilized all means to such an extent that his report will stand as an unprecedented accomplishment and as an authority for reference in all the future which lies before the Indian question.

The Indian will soon be blended with the general population. It may be that before the close of the decade events will have made such change in the Indian status that a separate census will not hereafter be needful, and the Indian population can be separately tabulated from ordinary schedules, just as the colored race has been hitherto. In this view the elaborate illustration of a report which may prove to be the last of its kind seemed to be important that the pictorial art might be effectively impressed into the preservation of facts soon to be out of personal experience and to be known only through records.

Mr. President, on the 20th day of March, 1894, there having come up some question as to whether there was an approval of these two reports by Mr. Porter when he was Superintendent of the Census, this letter was written by him:

NEW YORK, March 20, 1894.

MY DEAR MR. DONALDSON: On the 5th day of June, 1893, as Superintendent of the Eleventh Census, I officially approved the Final Report on Indians, Eleventh Census, prepared by Thomas Donalson, expert special agent, under a plan approved by John W. Noble, Secretary of the Interior, and myself. Certain questions in the matter of corrections made by Judge William Haydon, under my order, and Mr. Donaldson, the author, were left to Mr. Donaldson to insert, and he to make other proof corrections.

The final report as approved contained 39 pages of introduction and 856 pages of text, all of which were plated or ordered plated by me. The maps and illustrations, 269 pages in all, were also duly approved by me, and the copy of the list of the same for insertion in the final report ordered sent to the Printer.

The copy for the Bulletin on the Five Civilized Tribes, 302 pages, was officially approved by me June 6, 1893, together with 32 full-paged illustrations and two maps, and ordered sent to the Public Printer, Mr. Donaldson, expert special agent in charge, the author of the book, to make necessary corrections, the said corrections to be under his charge.

The above two reports, the Final Report on Indians, in type, and the Five Tribes Bulletin, in manuscript, were officially ordered by me to be delivered to Senator C. F. MANDERSON on the dates named in Expert Special Agent Donaldson's letters transmitting them.

If any further information is necessary, I shall be pleased to furnish you with it if within my means.

With assurance of high regard, believe me, very truly, yours,

ROBERT P. PORTER.

Hon. THOMAS DONALDSON,
Philadelphia, Pa.

P. S.—The plan and scope of the Five Civilized Tribe Bulletins were also approved by Secretary John W. Noble.

I have here upon my desk the final report of the Indian census. It is in type, and every page of it is electrotyped, and has been for months. The colored plates are owned by the Government, they having been contracted for by the Census Office, and the Government owns enough of the paper illustrations—not, of course, owning the colored lithographic stones—but it owns enough of the colored illustrations to complete this book; it owns the plates that make the black and white illustrations, and the report is all there, and has been there for months, ready to be issued. Mr. Commissioner Wright gives certain reasons why the work has not been issued. He seems to have been alarmed at this letter from Mr. Lummis in regard to the copyright, and he had fear that here was a repetition of matter contained in other reports. There are such repetitions, and there should be such repetitions. I have no question but that many pages of the final report upon the Indians are taken from works of the Indian Office, of the Bureau of Ethnology, and from other public documents. They are there for the purposes of comparison, and they are there so that in one volume one may have all that there is showing the condition of the Indian to-day.

The fact that they are not credited to those who have compiled them is neither here nor there. One is not in the habit of crediting that which is taken from a public document and simply placed in another public document; but in many instances they are credited by reference being made to the publication from which they are taken. But that is unimportant.

Mr. President, the Commissioner of Labor, in charge of the Census, received unquestionably, in answer to his letter in regard to the Lummis copyright, this letter, which was sent to him on the 20th day of January, 1894, and it is no more than fair, as the letter of Mr. Lummis charging this copyright theft, as he terms it, on Mr. Donaldson has appeared in the RECORD, that this letter should also appear. This is addressed to Commissioner of Labor Wright, in charge of the census.

326 NORTH THIRTY-NINTH STREET,
Philadelphia, Pa., January 20, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: Answering Mr. C. F. Lummis's letter of January 6, 1893—

It should be 1894, undoubtedly—

I regret exceedingly to have even seemingly injured Mr. Lummis. I have been one of his admirers for years past, and have felt the force of his literary capacity and energy.

At the time we were collecting the illustrations for the Moqui and Pueblo Bulletin, I did not know that Mr. Lummis was a photographer or that he made his own photographs. I am sure that not one he now calls attention to contained the word "copyright" when we received it, and I have never seen one since with the word "copyright" on it. We began to collect these views in 1890 (early in the summer). The plates or cuts were made in 1891, I think, and the person who made the cuts or plates supplied the printed copies as well. So that in 1891 the necessary number of printed illustrations were delivered to us. After this we could not have (had we known the fact) had Mr. Lummis's name put on the plates.

Some four full-page illustrations were made and supplied in 1893, and these contain the names of the photographers.

In 1891 or in 1892 my attention was called to some illustrations in a magazine. I think I found some of them similar to those to be in the Moqui-Pueblo Bulletin.

Upon inquiry (and from other sources), thinking some one had supplied the magazine with a set of our illustrations, I learned that Mr. Lummis claimed them.

That was before the letter of Lummis to the Commissioner.

When Mr. Porter wrote his letter of transmittal (see page VII, of Moqui and Pueblo Bulletin) I got him to insert a note of obligation to Mr. Lummis. It was and is a general one.

I would have written to Mr. Lummis, but did not have his address. No wrong was intended. Mr. Porter is in nowise responsible for the matter, and I am quite willing to assume the responsibility for any error in this matter.

Mr. Lummis, I understand, is a frank, honorable man, and I have no doubt will readily see how the whole matter occurred.

I am informed that an edition of this bulletin is to be published by private parties. I will have the parties write Mr. Lummis about the plates he claims, and he can be arranged with by them.

I will also see that Mr. Lummis's name goes on the plates made by him.

Will you be so good as to say to Mr. Lummis, when you write to him, that if he will send me a set of the photographs claimed to be his, and which were used in the Moqui and Pueblo Bulletin, I will gladly remit the price of them and see that he is given proper credit for them. I can only add that I regret that Mr. Lummis should have any cause for complaint in this matter. No wrong or thing improper was intended. I gave him much space in the Bulletin because I like his work.

Very truly,

THOMAS DONALDSON.

TO CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in charge of Eleventh Census.

That, Mr. President, explains pretty fully the condition as to the copyright. I received yesterday, while this debate was on, the letter which I shall read presently, as it sums up the whole subject, and it seems to me gives its proper history, and it is due to Mr. Donaldson that it should be read.

I do not want to be understood at any stage of this controversy as reflecting in the least upon the motives of Commissioner Wright. I think he has been acting under a misapprehension of the facts. He has thought undoubtedly that there were copyright illustrations that were proposed to be used in these additional books. That is not the fact. He has supposed that these particular works had not been approved officially by his predecessor in office.

That is not the fact. They were approved; and here is the abundant evidence of it, and I have no question but that when these matters come to his knowledge and he has full information upon the subject, he will take great pleasure in speedily issuing these important works that are needed for the purposes of legislation by Congress. The Indian appropriation bill will be up for consideration very soon. I, with others, have been seeking information upon the question as to whether it will be possible to dispense with some of the numerous and, as I believe, unnecessary Indian agents. In this last publication there is the material which will show that that can be done; and in that consideration alone it is important that this work should be speedily completed.

I shall now read the letter I received yesterday, signed Thomas Donaldson, and addressed to me:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 12, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: The unpublished volumes on Indians prepared by me for the Eleventh Census and approved by Hon. Robert P. Porter, Superintendent, are a bulletin on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indian Territory, 302 pages of manuscript, with 34 pages of maps and illustrations; and the Report on Indians, Eleventh Census, 1890, some 900 pages with 259 pages of maps and illustrations. This last report is all in type (except the list of illustrations, 8 pages, and the index, say 15 pages) and has been since the middle of 1893. Seven hundred and fifty-nine pages of it are in plate. This fact alone shows approval by Mr. Porter, and the remainder is fourth revise, and ready to be plated, and which must have been duly approved or it could not have reached this stage.

There are no copyrighted maps or illustrations in the Five Tribes Bulletin, and the officer detailed to close the work of the census was duly advised of this fact at once upon the question being asked. Any copyrighted maps or illustrations in the Report on Indians are used with permission.

The extract matter used in the last-named volume, stated by the officer detailed to close the work of the Eleventh Census to amount to 225 pages, was inserted with the knowledge and approval of Hon. Robert P. Porter, Superintendent of the Eleventh Census, and was considered by him essential and necessary to the work. He approved all such matter and sent it to be printed. The Indian census was taken under a special clause of the census act, and called for a report on the condition of the Indians. The historical portion of the report, of which the extracted or copied matter is largely a part, was considered essential to the end that light be given on their present condition, and how they came to it.

As to the question of the extract matter used by me in said work, it is not usual to credit matter taken from the works of the same author.

Many of these tables are compiled from former publications made under the direction of this author.

Neither is it considered necessary to credit extracts from publications issued by the United States. Such are not copyrighted and much of the authorship is impersonal. They are common property.

As to the expense of republishing such matter, it having been mentioned, I can only add that it is all in type, much of it has been plated, and the only expense now will be for the paper and presswork.

No question of copyright has ever been raised to my knowledge against the illustrations or maps in the two unpublished volumes on Indians. The copyright question raised related to illustrations in a volume published by Mr. Porter long before the officer at present in charge of the closing of the work of the Eleventh Census entered upon his duties, and with which he has, in fact, no concern. The method by which such illustrations reached the Census Office, and whether marked copyright or not, is entirely unknown to the officer in charge of the closing of the census. He does not know whether they were unlawfully used or not. He knows nothing of these details. No delay in the publication of the two volumes on Indians in question has occurred from any claim for use of copyrighted maps or illustrations.

The two volumes were ready, one to go to the printer, the other about ready to be printed and to go to the public when the officer now in charge was detailed to close the work of the census. My work was not of the unfinished class. Any revision of the two volumes on Indians which was going on when the officer now in charge of the census went on duty in October, 1893, was being done without authority of the Superintendent of the Census.

I was ill during the last three months of 1893, and in October and November of that year was in such condition as to care but little about census or any other work, so that I may not have answered letters sent me, but I venture that any letter requiring an answer or even suggesting it was taken in hand and duly answered by my clerk.

It seems to me that the question in this whole matter is whether or not the officer detailed to the charge of the census was to close the work of the census, or revamp the one made by Mr. Porter. These differences of opinion as to the duties of the officer in charge may have arisen in an entirely proper spirit. The statute ordering the detail would seem, however, to be a good guide in this matter.

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS DONALDSON.

Hon. C. F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate.

That would seem to be the history of this transaction.

Since yesterday I have had some conversation with my associates on the floor interested in the subject of a publication of some fair abstract or digest of the census to be speedily issued. I do not know but what the better course would be, if the abstract which was provided for in the bill and was stricken out by the action of the Senate, can certainly be issued by midsummer, and promises a work as it should be, that it ought to be published, and that hereafter, probably, we can save to the Government the matter of the publication of the digest, 50,000 copies of which are required to be published by the existing law. That, however, can be a matter for future discussion. I feel inclined, if we can add to this bill some proviso which will obtain for us speedily the publication and issue of these final works upon the Indians, so that we may have them at this session of Congress, to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the lines referred to were stricken out of the bill. I hope that will meet with the approval of the Senator in charge of the bill. If it shall do so, I should be glad to move that reconsideration, and let the abstract of the census be printed, adding to that section this proviso:

Provided, That the Report on Indians and the extra census bulletin on the Five Civilized Tribes be printed as approved by Robert P. Porter, Superintendent of the Eleventh Census, necessary corrections thereof to be made by the author.

That will mean, of course, those proper corrections which are incident to the publication of every book, such as proof-reading.

I should like to hear from the Senator in charge of the bill whether such action will meet with his approval.

Mr. HOAR rose.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to be heard?

Mr. HOAR. I wish to be heard for half a minute, either now or at some future time. I do not care when.

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think it is probable that many members of this body have studied the question with which the Senator from Nebraska has dealt in his argument. As I understand he entertains and expresses the highest respect for the Commissioner of Labor, Col. Wright, who is a constituent and friend of mine, but known, I suppose, in his public character as well to many other members of this body on both sides of the Chamber as he is to me. The Senator from Nebraska has expressed, I suppose, the opinion which everybody who knows Col. Wright has, that he is a very faithful, careful, conscientious, and wise public servant.

The Senator from Nebraska thinks that in a public document which Col. Wright has revised as the head of his Bureau, and which I understand the Secretary of the Interior to have also dealt with, so far as to be in accord with the opinion and action of the Commissioner of Labor, Col. Wright has been mistaken in striking out the repetition in a costly public document of large masses of matter which are already printed and accessible to the public and to us in other costly public documents.

Mr. MANDERSON. And it is well to say right here, if the Senator will permit me, that this matter thus inserted in this work was approved and commended not only by the predecessor in office of Commissioner Wright, but also by the predecessor of the present Secretary of the Interior, it receiving the approval of both those officers.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that appears. There has not been any suggestion that these gentlemen knew when they gave the more or less perfunctory approbation to this document, if they did give it, that it was largely made up of other documents.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a word in that connection?

Mr. HOAR. With pleasure.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Nebraska seems not to know or to overlook the fact that all these publications are mere preliminaries; that they are early bulletins in connection with the census, preparatory to being embodied in the final work, which is now under revision of the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the statutes. There has not been a single publication by the Census Office as a final publication.

Mr. HOAR. That is a very important statement.

Mr. President, it also appears that what the Senator from Nebraska supposes was known to Mr. Porter is contained in the letter which, though formally addressed to him, was in fact received at the office long after his resignation, and after the present Secretary of the Interior had come in.

The Senator further states what we could accept on his authority, and I suppose what other Senators from their own knowledge know or think—I know nothing about that myself—that the gentleman who has prepared this work is a faithful and accomplished gentleman, whose literary, scientific, and statistical work is entitled to high respect.

So the question is presented whether the Senate of the United States—not in determining what shall be its own documents, but in determining what shall be printed in the documents of the Departments, and what shall be printed as mere abstracts or preliminaries should be omitted in such publications—is to take upon itself the responsibility of considering, debating, and deciding such questions.

There must be somebody responsible for such things. If this gentleman, accomplished and able and the friend of the Senator from Nebraska, is entitled to come here and ask us to say that his work has been cut down improperly by his superior, not being approved by his superior, and therefore that we must go all over the matter, there is not a subordinate in the Agriculture Department, in the Census Office, in the Indian Office, in the Treasury, in the Statistical Office, in the Bureau of Labor, in the consular service, or anywhere else who has not that same right.

Mr. President, I know some pretty learned and accomplished gentlemen who have been in the consular service of the United States under the last Administration. They have been turned out; they have been, in my judgment, turned out under a mistaken policy. My friend from Missouri knows some men equally good, appointed under the former Democratic Administration, who have been turned out under what I have no doubt he thought was a mistake when it was done. Each one of those men has made his report, has made his investigations, and we get seven copies of them from the State Department for distribution, and as many others as we ask for. I want to know if I am entitled to come in here and debate for an hour, or a day, on an appropriation bill the question whether the consular reports of my excellent friend, whom I shall name, because he is a Democrat holding office under the present Administration, who was displaced four years ago, and has gone back again to Glasgow. I refer to Mr. F. H. Underwood, one of the most accomplished gentlemen in the country. I have no doubt that it will be found that Mr. Underwood's consular report contained a great deal of valuable matter that has not been printed and ought to have been printed, and I can prove it; I have not looked to see; but he is a gentleman who was the companion and equal and friend of Mr. Lowell, Mr. Holmes, Mr. Parkman, and the other men of letters of Boston in his time. There are a hundred such cases, and it is a pretty serious question to us whether it is our duty to represent the desires of those gentlemen.

Mr. MANDERSON. If I may interrupt the Senator right there——

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish the illustration of what I have just been saying.

Mr. MANDERSON. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I know of another case. I have a friend, who is the son of one of the greatest men who ever lived in this country and who is himself a very accomplished man, who is employed in the Agricultural Department. He made some most valuable scientific investigations for that Department, and after he had made them they were taken, as I believe, by a superior, changed, injured, rendered less valuable both in a literary and scientific point of view, and not only published without credit, but, on the contrary, there was a preface inserted which seemed to imply that this gentleman had not done his full duty in what he had done.

I have been talking with that gentleman, have written one or two letters to the Secretary of Agriculture, and have an assurance that, so far as credit is concerned, it shall be given him at some future time. But if the Senate is the proper place to correct such matters, it is my duty to bring that question up here, and I can supply the Senate with an hour's occupation pretty easily.

So it seems to me, without entering upon an answer to my honorable friend from Nebraska, that this is not the time nor the place to correct mistakes made in relation to these matters of scientific and literary investigations, be it poor work or good work, or good work omitted and not published. We must leave such questions to the Departments, and when it is conceded that the officer who has done this thing is one of the brightest judges we have in the country to judge of the matter, it seems to me it is peculiarly proper that it should be left to the Department.

Mr. MANDERSON. I suggest to the Senator that the example he furnishes of his friend, the consul at Glasgow, is not parallel to this case. Unquestionably it is the right of the superior to revise, to cut, to mutilate in his discretion the literary work of the inferior. But suppose the consul under the last Administration had made a report and the Secretary of State in the last Administration had approved that report, or had revised it and changed it somewhat, and had sent it to the Printer with his official approval, and it was about ready to go to press, then does the Senator think that the successor of that Secretary of State should change the order of his predecessor and say the work shall not be issued?

Mr. HOAR. The Secretary who issues it is the person who is responsible for the act of issuing it, and the fact that the previous Secretary had intended to issue it or approve it is not the final action of the Department. Suppose when Mr. Foster, Secretary of State, went out of office he had a letter written and approved in the Department of State to be sent to England, and sent it to the Public Printer or the private printer of the State Department to be got ready, and Mr. Gresham had come in at that point: he is the person who is to determine whether that letter shall go, and the matter is not acted upon by the Department until it has gone. If the letter had gone to England and the act become the act of the country it would have been Mr. Gresham's duty, and Mr. Cleveland's, to stand by it through thick and thin; and the President would have found himself very strongly criticised if he had not done it, whatever he might have thought privately of it. That is the rule in the diplomatic conduct of the affairs of a great nation.

Mr. HALE. Let me put an instance to the Senator. Suppose, just in the line of his thought, that upon the question of the Bering Sea arbitration a Secretary of State who is about going out invoked the assistance of clerks and experts to get up a letter, an answer, and has approved what they have done and is ready to issue it, but he goes out of office. His successor comes in, and clearly that successor, as the Senator has said, is the responsible man. He may not agree that the compilation and the facts that were got up by the clerks for his predecessor cover all the case; and he must decide, and he alone.

Mr. HOAR. And it would be peculiarly singular if under those circumstances Congress was asked to interfere by legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I regret very much that this discussion has taken place. I do not think that it was a necessary discussion growing out of anything that has happened in the management of the Census Office by the present incumbent of that place. I do not think an issue has been wisely made in the Senate and before the country between Mr. Donaldson and Mr. Wright. I have known both those gentlemen for many years, and I value them equally as friends. I think I also appreciate the peculiar traits and abilities of each of the gentlemen; Mr. Donaldson is a man of great energy, learning, research, and enthusiasm.

The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 1 o'clock p. m.). The Senator from New Hampshire will suspend. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being House bill 4864.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask permission of the Senator from Tennessee to go on and finish my remarks upon this subject.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator's speech will keep until 5 o'clock this evening. I regret the necessity, but I must object to any encroachment upon the time set apart for the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I bow with deference to the Senator from Tennessee.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

[Mr. PEFFER resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on Friday, April 6. The entire speech will be published hereafter. See Appendix.]

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, the passage of the bill under consideration, known as the Wilson bill, if, indeed it can be said to be a fulfillment of the pledges contained in the national Democratic platform of 1892 upon the subject of the tariff, would, in my judgment, be a national legislative recognition of one of the most dangerous political, economic, and constitutional heresies ever advocated by any political party since the foundation of our Government.

The doctrine of the right of secession upon the part of a State, condemned, as it has been, not only by the stern arbitrament of the sword on the battlefields of the nation, but at last by universal assent and acquiescence, was one, in my judgment, fraught with but little more danger to the best interests of the Republic than that involved in the present bill, if it is indeed what it professes to be, a fulfillment of party pledges on this subject.

Never, in all our long history as a nation, has any political party in any national convention had the audacity to declare that a customs tariff, which had for its purpose not only the raising of revenue, but the protection of American industries and American labor, was unconstitutional, until the Democratic national convention of 1892 deliberately asserted that doctrine.

To that convention was reserved the honor, if indeed an honor it be, of placing upon the Constitution of our country a construction directly opposite to that placed upon it not only by every national convention of every political party ever assembled in this country, but also in direct conflict with and antagonism to the repeated declarations and avowed policies of the framers of that instrument, including such men as Washington, Madison, Jefferson, Monroe, and later on Jackson, Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Buchanan, Pierce, Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Arthur, and Harrison.

The last Democratic national convention, which framed the platform on which the present Administration came into power, made the following declaration upon this subject:

> We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purpose of revenue only.

The present bill as it came from the House was ostensibly and professedly the enforcement of the policy enunciated in this plank of the national Democratic platform. And while it is true, by reason of some unaccountable temporary aberration of the public mind, the party announcing such a doctrine in its national platform, was by the elections of 1892 clothed with power in all branches of the National Government, it remains to be seen whether, when the paralyzing effects which must necessarily result to our national prosperity from the enforcement of such a doctrine, or any other doctrine approximating to it, become apparent—and they are already more than apparent—there will be a vote of confidence in the Administration responsible for its enforcement.

For the present, and at this stage of the discussion, I will assume that the Democratic party is an honest party, a keeper of party pledges, a party whose leaders would reject with scorn and spurn with unfeigned indignation, a proposition to insert in a national platform a plank upon any subject for the sole purpose of aiding in the elevation of their party to power, and without any intention whatever of enforcing the doctrine enunciated in such plank when they came into power. Assuming, then, these premises to be true, I shall for the present assume further that the pending bill is the equivalent in theory and practical purpose and effect in its fullest and completest sense of the doctrine enunciated in the national Democratic platform of 1892 on the subject of the tariff, and on which, through some strange hypnotic influence over the wage workers and voters of this country, the Democratic party came into control of every department of the National Government on the 4th day of March, 1893.

Prior to the Democratic national convention of 1892 the distinctive difference separating political parties and political economists in this country in their avowed opinions and policies, respectively, on the subject of the tariff, was not one involving constitutional power or the lack of constitutional power upon the part of Congress to enact a customs revenue act, which, while primarily raising the necessary revenue with which to carry on the Government, gave protection, incidental or otherwise, to American industries and American labor.

The line of demarkation was infinitely less marked than this. It consisted in this alone: All agreed, prior to this new departure, perhaps with the single exception of the declaration of the Democratic party in its national platform of 1856, that in any event and under all circumstances, Congress in enacting tariff laws, in levying impost duties, should so arrange duties as to give incidental protection.

The constitutional power to do this, or the duty of Congress to do this, prior to 1892, with the single exception stated, was never denied by any political convention of any party ever assembled in this country, nor by very few individuals, but on the contrary frequently affirmed, while the party and the men who believe as I do and as the Republican party does now and always has done in regard to the general question, have occupied ground one mighty step in advance of this and held to the doctrine of the constitutional power as well also as a primary duty upon the part of Congress, in pursuance of the constitutional grant to regulate commerce with foreign nations, to levy impost duties with a primary purpose, if you please, not merely of raising revenue, but of protecting the various industries of our country against the industrial encroachments, and, I may say, the industrial oppressions of foreign powers.

In other words, until the doctrine enunciated in the Democratic platform at Chicago in 1892, all parties conceded the constitutional power to levy tariff duties with a view, not merely of raising revenue, but of giving at least incidental protection, while the Republican party, following in the grand footprints with which the legislative and administrative records of this country are dotted, of such men as Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, Monroe, Jackson, Clay, Webster, and other like men whose names are immortal, has held and still holds to the doctrine of the constitutional power to levy impost duties on foreign productions which come into direct competition with home productions and thus destroy our industries and reduce the daily pay roll of the wage-workers of this country, which are absolutely prohibitory in their nature and not intended or expected to raise a single dollar of revenue.

True, the Democratic party has for the past thirty-six years been a free-trade party, and in 1856 its leaders in national convention went so far as to make this declaration in their national platform:

> The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of free seas and progressive free trade throughout the world.

And it was on such a platform the people of the United States made a most fearful mistake, similar in many respects to that made in 1892, and elected James Buchanan President of the United States. But what was the result? The national Treasury became almost bankrupt, the national credit shaken, confidence destroyed, the fires of a martial conflagration were kindled all over the land, and the very life of the Republic was placed in imminent jeopardy; and in November, 1860, all these things becoming clearly apparent to the people, they, realizing the fearful mistake that was made in 1857, hurled the Democratic party from power by the triumphant election of Abraham Lincoln and Hannibal Hamlin, the two great exponents and leaders of the principles of the Republican party, a party pledged not only to the preservation of the Union, but to the doctrine of protection to the industries and the rights of the wage-workers against the industrial assaults of foreign manufacturers and producers and the undermining and paralyzing influence of the pauper labor of the Old World.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHOUP in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Does the Senator mean to assert that the election of Lincoln and Hamlin was a triumph of protection?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. To a very great extent I think it was a very great tribute to them in that regard.

Mr. PALMER. Has the Senator from Oregon ever read Mr. Blaine's valuable work?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I have read every word of it.

Mr. PALMER. Does not the Senator recollect that Mr. Blaine distinctly states that there were thousands of men who voted for Mr. Lincoln who never thought of a tariff bill, and that in Pennsylvania the protectionists, who were otherwise comparatively neutral, were brought to the support of the Government, influenced by protection alone. I voted for Lincoln and Hamlin, and so did more than 40,000 Democrats in Illinois, and none of us ever dreamed that we were giving encouragement to or supporting the doctrine of protection.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am very sorry the distinguished Senator from Illinois, for whom, as he knows, I have the profoundest respect, is not voting now as he did then.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to say, referring to the remarks of the Senator from Illinois, that I recollect very distinctly that campaign, and the condition of affairs in Pennsylvania. Mr. Lincoln would not have carried Pennsylvania except on the protective plank of the platform.

Mr. PALMER. I think that is true. I think the protection element had always been indifferent to the demands of patriotism. It is essentially selfish and self-seeking. Mr. Blaine says substantially what the Senator says.

Mr. QUAY. I will state what was the condition of things in in Pennsylvania. The eastern part of the State was conservative; the city of Philadelphia was trading with the South, and it was with difficulty it was unmoored from its old Whig moorings. The western part of the State, west of the Allegheny Mountains, was in sympathy with the sentiment of Illinois. As to the patriotism of Eastern Pennsylvania, it manifested its patriotism during the war. There was no State and no section of any State in which patriotism was evinced to a higher extent than in the State of Pennsylvania; and there was no portion of Pennsylvania, and no portion of any other State which sent proportionally more troops to the army than Eastern Pennsylvania.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am very glad indeed to have the benefit of the evidence of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], than whom there is none more competent to speak in regard to the influences which were operating and controlling in the election of 1860 in so far as the great State of Pennsylvania is concerned.

Mr. PALMER. While I have no word to utter against Pennsylvania and its most eminent, patriotic governor, Andrew G. Curtin, yet it was distinctly understood in the convention which nominated Mr. Lincoln that it was necessary that something should be offered to the protection interest of Pennsylvania in order to secure its vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Whatever may have been the controlling influences in the election of 1860, it is a fact that history frequently repeats itself in many respects, and I imagine it requires no uncommon gift of prescience or prophecy to either see or predict a repetition of as complete an overthrow of the Democratic party in this country in 1896 as befell it in 1860.

But while the Democratic party in 1856 declared in favor of "free seas and progressive free trade throughout the world," they did not place their advocacy of free trade on the ground of any lack of constitutional power to levy impost duties which might afford protection, either incidental or otherwise. That doctrine was never asserted by any party, as I have said, until the Democratic party of 1892 asserted it at Chicago, nor was this doctrine the result either of accident or lack of serious consideration.

On the contrary, it was the result of studied deliberation and supreme determination upon the part of the great leaders of the Democratic party. It will not be forgotten that in that convention the majority of the appropriate committee having control of the subject, reported a resolution on the subject of the tariff and recommended its adoption. This resolution read as follows:

> But in making reductions in taxes it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries, but to promote their healthy growth.

That, Mr. President, was good Republican doctrine; that was the doctrine of the Constitution of our country. It was under such a policy that this country has grown from the weakest and most helpless in the family of nations to that of the greatest, most powerful, most invincible, most independent, and most magnificent Republic on the face of the earth—a nation, which is, in its grand development, in all those great elements which go to make up a civilization, such as the pen of the historian has never heretofore written about.

But, Mr. President, that declaration of a mere handful of men on a committee did not suit either the great leaders in that convention or the convention itself. The Star-Eyed Goddess and other of the really great leaders and exponents of the principles of the Democratic party were on the watchtowers of that convention to see to it that no declaration which looked to the promotion of the "healthy growth" of the domestic industries of this country should find a place in any national Democratic platform.

These great leaders, who were firm believers in the doctrine of "progressive free trade throughout the world," as enunciated in the national Democratic platform of 1856, were determined that no such miserable heresy as that reported by the majority of the committee should be incorporated into their national platform. But not only so. They solemnly resolved that once for all they would base their opposition to any such doctrine on grave constitutional grounds and not on grounds of mere economic policy. And then it was that Mr. Neal, a member of the minority of that committee, submitted as a substitute for the resolution of the majority this resolution:

> We denounce the Republican protection as a fraud, a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few. We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purposes of revenue only, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of the Government when honestly and economically administered.

This resolution, it will be observed, ignored all reference to "our domestic industries," denied in the most emphatic manner any constitutional power upon the part of Congress by tariff legislation to "promote their healthy growth," and for the first time in the history of our country boldly asserted the infamous economical and constitutional heresy that there was no constitutional power in the National Government to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the sole purpose of revenue, and further that this was a "fundamental principle of the Democratic party." In other words, any tariff duties levied with a view not alone of raising revenue, but with the further additional purpose of "promoting the healthy growth of our industries" is unconstitutional. This substitute was overwhelmingly and enthusiastically adopted by that convention as the solemn, deliberate act of the Democratic party.

That the majority of the voters of this country should have ever cast their votes for a party holding to such a doctrine as they unquestionably did in November, 1892, will, perhaps, remain a mystery while time lasts. It will scarcely do to say, and I will not say it, that the great majority of the voters of this country did not understand it, and yet perhaps it would be hardly fair to apply the maxim, ignorantia legis non excusat, to the great majority of the voters of this country.

However, whether the people of the country understood it then or not, they came to understand it very clearly in less than a year afterwards in at least one great State in the Union, when in November, 1893, Mr. Neal, the father of this resolution, was, as the candidate of the Democratic party for governor of the great State of Ohio, snowed under by I believe a Republican plurality of something like 100,000 votes in favor of William McKinley, the Republican candidate. And as time rolled on and the designs of the party in power became apparent, Pennsylvania moves to the front with a popular disapproval of the doctrine of free trade, or a tariff for revenue only, which is the same thing, by a majority of nearly 200,000 votes, Rhode Island follows suit in still more emphatic terms, while every municipality throughout the country which has had an opportunity since then, joins in emphatic condemnation of the Democratic policy.

And in view of the ineffaceable history of the past, in view of a record of over one hundred years of national life, illuminated with and indelibly stamped by emanations from the minds of the most brilliant constitutional lawyers, the ablest statesmen, the most distinguished patriots this or any other country has ever known, all recognizing the constitutional power on the part of Congress not only to levy imports for the purpose of raising revenue, but also for the purpose of imparting protection, vigor, and vitality to domestic industries and domestic labor, it would seem a strange spectacle that the Senate of the United States at this late day should be called upon to defend the Constitution of our country against an attack so unjustifiable, unfounded, and so dangerous to our institutions as that contained in the Democratic platform of 1892.

Can it be possible that the generation of to-day have never truly learned, or if they have, that they have so soon forgotten the great culminating and overshadowing cause, which more than all other causes combined led, over one hundred years ago, to the overthrow of the Articles of Confederation and the establishment of our present Constitution? It was not any mere restraint of personal freedom or of individual liberty which constituted the moving power in that great political renaissance which transformed a government, feeble in organic structure, impotent in physical development, absolutely lacking in those essential elements of governmental power necessary to the protection, not only of its own existence, but also that of its institutions and its industries, and the advancement of its best hopes and the culmination of its highest and best aspirations into a mighty nation—grand in conception, invincible in structural strength, and which constituted "a more perfect union" which tended to "establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity" forever.

It was, Mr. President, something more than this which quickened the oppressed of the days of the Confederation, who had felt all the harassing consequences of free trade, which held full sway in this country during those six years, to throw off a government which was scarcely worth the name, and in its place establish the Constitution of the United States. It was the industrial oppressions of England and not mere infractions of personal liberty against which the people and the Congress under the government of the Confederation were powerless, which more than all other causes led to the overthrow of that government and the adoption of the present Constitution. Under the Articles of Confederation the Congress was wholly destitute of power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations," or "to provide for the common defense and the general welfare."

The power to levy customs duties under the government of the Confederation was vested in the States respectively and not in the Congress, and what was the result? The States undertook separately to deal with this great subject, not only of commerce with foreign nations but with the several States. Scarcely any two States legislated on the same lines. Local State interest as contradistinguished from the welfare of the whole nation controlled legislation. There was absolutely no restriction on foreign importations. A product denied free entrance at the ports of one State was admitted free of duty in the ports of another, and the result was there was neither regulation of commerce with foreign nations nor restriction, much less prohibition of importation of any foreign products, however destructive of American industries, or however paralyzing to American labor. The Congress was powerless, and the country benumbed with the weakening influence of its own inate impotency stood remediless at the mercy of the rapacity of Great Britain.

FREE TRADE UNDER THE CONFEDERATION.

It will doubtless forever remain an inexplicable mystery why it was that the colonists, after having waged the war of the Revolution mainly for the purpose of freeing themselves from the industrial oppressions of Great Britain, should have so signally failed, as all historians now agree they did fail, to properly garner the fruits of their great victory in the formation of the new government. It is a great historical fact that the men who framed the Articles of Confederation by failing to confer on the Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, wholly failed to properly protect the new nation against the continued industrial encroachments of Great Britain and other foreign powers.

That omission was the one fatal mistake which involved the people of this country during the next six years in industrial calamities and financial disasters, such as were never experienced by any other people in any other land. And it was this aggregation of disasters which so surrounded and overwhelmed the people during the days of the Confederation, which opened their eyes to the fearful mistake that had been made in the formation of the fundamental law of their national being, and which caused them with one accord, led on by such men as Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, to supplant the government of the Confederation with the Constitution of the United States.

The economist, Young, in his work on National Economy, in discussing this subject, says:

> Although the States were politically independent, it was impossible to countervail the policy of other nations. Each State having, under the Confederation, the right to regulate its own trade, it imposed upon foreign productions, as well as those of its sister States, such duties as its own interests seemed to dictate. The States attempted by their separate navigation laws to secure their trade to their own vessels; and the selfish policy of some States counteracted the efforts of others. As the Congress had no power to lay duties or regulate trade, and as the States could not agree upon a uniform rate of duties, foreign nations passed such laws as they judged most likely to destroy our commerce and extend their own.
> Especially was this the policy of Great Britain. Our trade with her West India colonies was prohibited; and, by the enforcement of her navigation acts, our navigation was nearly destroyed. Foreign vessels and goods being freely admitted into the States, while ours were burdened with heavy duties in foreign ports, both the prices of goods imported and the prices of our exports were subject to the will of foreigners; and the money of our citizens was rapidly passing into the pockets of British manufacturers and merchants. In describing the state of the country at that time, a distinguished American statesman thus remarks:
> "In the comparative condition of the United States and Great Britain, not a hatter, a boot or shoe maker, a saddler, or a brass founder could carry on his business, except in the coarsest and most ordinary productions of their various trades, under the pressure of this foreign competition. Thus was presented the extraordinary and calamitous spectacle of a successful revolution wholly failing of its ultimate object. The people of America had gone to war, not for names, but for things. It was not merely to change a Government administered by kings, princes, and ministers for a Government administered by Presidents, and Secretaries, and members of Congress; it was to redress their own grievances, to improve their own condition, to throw off the burden which the colonial system laid on their industry. To attain these objects they endured incredible hardships, and bore and suffered almost beyond the measure of humanity. And when the independence was attained, they found it was a piece of parchment. The arm which had struck for it in the field was palsied in the workshop; the industry which had been burdened in the colonies was crushed in the free States; and at the close of the revolution the mechanics and manufacturers of the country found themselves, in the bitterness of their hearts, independent—and ruined."

And in this connection it may not be unprofitable to glance for a moment at the terrible consequences which followed this unfortunate omission in the Articles of Confederation to confer on the Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and which so overwhelmed the people of that day with commercial, industrial, and financial desolation.

Importations of the value of over thirty millions from England alone came into this country during the first two years succeeding the close of the Revolutionary war, in 1774 and 1775, while our exports for the same period were less than $9,000,000; the flow of gold to Europe was constant; our country was drained of specie; the circulating medium was contracted; the wages of laboring men were reduced; the price of farms and farm products, the inevitable result of excessive importations and the contraction of the currency, went down, and financial ruin and universal discontent and suffering were the result.

Then it was the people of this country were brought to a full realization of the fearful consequences of free trade. This is fully realized in Hildredth's History of the United States. In speaking of this era he says:

> The fisheries, formerly a chief resource of New England, broken up by the war, had not yet been reestablished. The farmers no longer found that market for their produce which the French, American, and British armies had furnished. The large importation of foreign goods, subject to little or no duty, and sold at peace prices, was proving ruinous to all those domestic manufactures and mechanical employments which the nonconsumption agreements and the war had created and fostered. Immediately after the peace the country had been flooded with imported goods, and debts had been unwarily contracted for which there was no means to pay. * * * The excessive importation of foreign goods had drained the country of specie.

We are prone to lament the evil times in which we have fallen the past year, but they bear no comparison in disastrous consequences to the experiences through which the people of this country passed during the six years intervening between the close of the Revolutionary war, the adoption of the Articles of Confederation, and the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. A few references to historical facts may serve to remind the people of to-day of those fearful times.

Massachusetts, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and some other States of the Confederation enacted laws making cattle and other species of property a legal tender for the payment of private debts. In other States open revolt rose up in all its hideous proportions and the spirit of anarchy to a very great extent was abroad in the land. It will not be forgotten that in the State of New Hampshire the members of the Legislature were made and held prisoners by armed mobs, who demanded that certain legislative action be taken in the interest of the people before they were released. It was during this period that the revolt known as Shay's rebellion, in the State of Massachusetts, drenched the historic ground of that great State with blood.

In speaking of this critical period the historian Belknap refers to the laws passed by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts in these words:

> Similar difficulties at the same time existed in the neighboring State, Massachusetts, to remedy which among other palliatives a law was passed called a "tender act," by which it was provided that executions issued for private demands might be satisfied by cattle and other enumerated articles at an appraisement by impartial men under oath.

Similar laws were passed in the State of South Carolina and other States.

The historian Ramsay, in his History of South Carolina, volume 2, page 428, among other things, says:

Laws were passed in which property of every kind was made a legal tender in the payment of private debts, although payable according to contract in gold or silver. Other laws installed the debt so that of sums already due only a third, and afterwards only a fifth, was annually recoverable in the courts of law.

Mathew Carey, in discussing the history of the times during the Government of the Confederation and the effect upon the prosperity of the country of unrestricted free trade and of a lack of power upon the part of the National Government to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, says:

The ports of this country, I repeat, were open to the commerce of the whole world, while with an impost so light as not even to meet the wants of the Treasury, the consequences followed which have never failed to follow such a state of things. Our markets were glutted. Prices fell. Competition on the part of our manufacturers was at an end. They were beggared and bankrupted. The merchants whose importations had ruined them were involved in the calamity and the farmers who had felicitated themselves on the grand advantage of "buying foreign merchandise cheap" sunk likewise into the vortex of general destruction.

Belknap, in his History of New Hampshire, in speaking of this period of our nation's history and of the disastrous effects of unrestricted free trade upon the people of this country, says:

Silver and gold, which had circulated largely in the latter years of the war, were returning by the usual course of trade to those countries whence large quantities of necessary and unnecessary commodities had been imported. Had any general system of imposts been adopted some part of this money might have been retained and some part of the public debt discharged; but the power of Congress did not extend to this object; and the States were not united in the expediency of delegating new and sufficient powers to that body. The partial imposts laid by some of the States were ineffectual as long as others found their interests in omitting them.

These historical references, Mr. President, give some idea of the condition of our country during that period when there was no constitutional power in the Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and it is to such a condition our country and its people will be again driven, if the fearful heresy that there is no constitutional power in the Congress of this new nation to regulate commerce with foreign nations by imposing restrictive and even prohibitory custom duties should ever find substantial expression on the statute books of our country.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, in his elaborate and eloquent speech delivered in the Senate in the opening of this debate on the 2d instant, alluded to Thomas Jefferson and eulogized what he construed to be his doctrines upon the subject of the tariff. I fear the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, notwithstanding his great learning and experience, has studied in vain the history of the life and works of Thomas Jefferson, and I beg in this connection to attract his attention to some of the declarations of Mr. Jefferson, made by him more than two years before he penned the immortal Declaration of Independence. He said:

That to heighten still the idea of parliamentary justice, and to show with what moderation they are likely to exercise power where themselves are to feel no part of its weight, we take leave to mention to His Majesty certain other acts of the British Parliament by which we were prohibited from manufacturing for our own use the articles we raise on our own lands with our own labor. By an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty, King George II, an American subject is forbidden to make a hat for himself of the fur which he has taken, perhaps, on his own soil—an instance of despotism to which no parallel can be produced in the most arbitrary ages of British history.

By one other act, passed in the twenty-third year of the same reign, the iron which we make we are forbidden to manufacture; and heavy as that article is, and necessary in every branch of husbandry, besides commission and insurance, we are to pay freight for it to Great Britain, and freight for it back again, for the purpose of supporting, not men, but machines, in the island of Great Britain.

Subsequently to this, after the fierce trials of the people under the government of the Confederation and while President of the United States, he on more than one occasion gave public expression, as did Washington, Madison, Monroe, and Hamilton, to the doctrine of the constitutional power upon the part of Congress to regulate commerce by invoking the taxing power.

When the McKinley bill was under consideration in the Senate I had the honor, on August 19, 1890, to discuss this question. Bearing directly upon this phase of the subject, I desire to quote from what I then said.

But not the least conclusive argument in favor of the construction now claimed for the provisions of the Constitution under consideration is the fact that one of the first great measures adopted by the Congress after the adoption of the Constitution was a tariff act based upon the purpose and founded on the lines of protection to American industry and American labor. It was in the discussion of that bill in the national House of Representatives in 1789 that Representative Fisher Ames used these significant words:

"I conceive, sir, that the present Constitution was dictated by commercial necessity more than by any other cause. The want of an official government to secure the manufacturing interest and to advance our commerce was long seen by men of judgment and pointed out by patriots solicitous to promote our general welfare."

Scarcely had the present Government been inaugurated until the new Congress was flooded with petitions from all sections of the country praying the enactment of tariff laws based upon the theory of protection. From among others these petitions came from the tradesmen, mechanics, and others of the town of Baltimore; from the mechanics, shipwrights, and laborers of the city of Charleston, in South Carolina; from the manufacturers and laboring classes of the city of New York, and from those of Boston, Providence, and other New England cities.

These petitions felicitated Congress and the country on the fact that by the change from the Confederation to the Union a happy effect had been realized and a new era had dawned wherein the interests of the manufacturer, the laborer, the producer as well as the consumer in this country were no longer imperiled by being subject, in so far as protection against excessive importations and restrictive foreign trade laws were concerned, to the will of the Legislatures of the States respectively, but that all these sacred interests were now committed to the protecting care and guardianship of one sovereign Legislature, the Congress of the United States, possessed of the sole and exclusive power to levy duties on imports.

It was in response to these resolutions and the universal wish of the leading statesmen of the country that James Madison in the very morning of the new Union made the subject of tariff legislation on the lines of protection the first and main topic of consideration in the American Congress, and among other things, while advocating this measure in 1789, Mr. Madison said:

"The States that are most advanced in population, and ripe for manufactures, ought to have their particular interests attended to in some measure. While these States retained the power of making regulations of trade, they had the power to protect and cherish such institutions. By adopting the present Constitution they have thrown the exercise of this power into other hands; they must have done this with an expectation that those interests would not be neglected here." (See Gale & Seaton's Debates, O. S., volume 1, page 116.)

A study of the history of those times will show conclusively that all the great statesmen of that day, from Washington down, favored and approved the construction that Congress had the clear and undeniable power under the Constitution, and moreover that it was a solemn duty on the part of Congress to enact such tariff legislation as would give reasonable and adequate protection to the American manufacturer, artisan, laborer, and farmer. This view is strengthened by a reference to the great speech of Rufus Choate delivered in this body March 14, 1842, and from which I beg to quote as follows. He said:

"And who in that assembly of men—many of whom sat in the convention which framed the Constitution, all of whom had partaken in the discussions which preceded its adoption—breathed a doubt on the competence of Congress to receive such petitions as these, and to grant their prayer? 'I conceive' (said the most eloquent of the eloquent, Mr. Ames), 'I conceive, sir, that the present Constitution was dictated by commercial necessity more than any other cause. The want of an efficient government to secure the manufacturing interest and to advance our commerce was long seen by men of judgment, and pointed out by patriots solicitous to promote our general welfare.' But I have more to say before I have done on the proceedings of that Congress, and leave them for the present. In the meanwhile, I submit to you that the proof is complete that the people who adopted the Constitution universally, and without a doubt, believed that it embodied this power. It was for that they received it with one wide acclaim, with tears of exultation, with ceremonies of auspicious significance, befitting the dawn of our age of pacific and industrial glory. Even those who feared its imperial character and its other powers, who thought they saw the States attracted to its center and absorbed by its rays, did not fear this power.

"And now, sir, I wonder if, after all, the people were deluded into this belief? I wonder if that heroic and energetic generation of our fathers which had studied the controversies and had gone through the tasks of the Revolution which had framed the Confederation, proved its weakness, proved its defects; which had been trained by a long and dreary experience of the insufficiency of a nominal independence to build up a diffused and massive and national prosperity, if the trade laws of foreign government, the combinations of foreign capitalists, the necessities of foreign existence, are allowed to take from the native laborer his meal of meat, and from his children their school, and depress his standard of comfortable life; which had been trained by experience, by the discussions of its ablest minds, in an age of extraordinary mental discussions of its ablest minds, in an age of extraordinary mental activity, and yet of great morality, sobriety, and subordination, peculiarly favorable to the task, trained thus to the work of constructing a new government, I wonder if such a generation were deceived after all.

"I wonder if it was not living water, that which they supposed they saw gushing from the rock, and sparkling and swelling at their feet, but only a delusive imitation, struck out by the wand of an accursed enchantment. No, sir; no man who believes that the people of this country were fit to govern themselves—fit to frame a constitution, fit to judge on it, fit to administer it—no such man can say that the belief, the popular belief in 1789, of the existence of this power, under the circumstances, is not absolutely conclusive proof of its existence.

"And then, in addition to this, how do you deal with the fact that all the framers of the Constitution themselves, as well as every public man alive in 1789, and the entire intelligence of the country, supposed they had inserted this power in it?

"Did not those who made it know what they had done? Considering their eminent general character, their civil discretion, their preparation of much study, and yet more experience of arduous public affairs for the task; their thorough acquaintance with the existing system, State and national, and with the public mind and opinions of the day; the long, patient, and solitary labor which they bestowed on it; the immediate necessity imposed on them of explaining and defending it to the country—in view of this, if you find them unanimously concurring in it, ascribing this power to the instrument, is it not the transcendentalism of unbelief to doubt? Do we really think we are likely to understand their own work now better than they did the day they finished it?

"Well, sir, we have satisfactory evidence that the members of the convention went, all of them, to their graves in the belief that the Constitution contained this power. Mr. Madison's opinion I have read. We have it on unquestionable authority that Mr. Gallatin has repeatedly said that upon his entrance into political life in 1789 he found it to be the universal opinion of those who framed the Constitution and those who resisted its adoption, the opinion of all the statesmen of the day, that Congress possessed the power to protect domestic industry by means of commercial regulations.

"And when more than half a century has passed away Daniel Webster, in referring to these petitions in his great speech at Albany, August 27, 1844, and to the construction placed upon them by the statesmen of that day and the credit, moreover, accorded them in view of the changed powers of Congress in virtue of the clause in the new Constitution, used these memorable words, plainly indicating his views as to the powers and duties of Congress in reference to this important subject. He said:

"Now, I ask you again, how were these petitions for protection treated? Did Congress deny its power? Did it say that it could not possibly give them this protection unless it should happen to be incidental? Did it say we have only a revenue power in regard to this matter? That is, we have the clear and undoubted power to take so much money out of your pockets and apply it to our own purposes, but God forbid that, in doing so, we should do you any good at the same time. Were these petitioners told that they must take care of themselves; that these were days of free trade and everybody must have a right to trade on equal terms with everybody else? Far, far from it.

"In regard to the subject of these petitions, we all know that the very first Congress secured to the navigation of the United States that which has been from that time to this the great foundation, not only of preference, but of monopoly—the whole coasting trade of the Union; and the shipwrights of America enjoy that monopoly to the present day, and I hope they will enjoy it forever. Look at the coasting trade of the United States, so vast in its extent. It is entirely confined to American shipping. * * * But how did Congress treat these petitions from the cities of New York and Baltimore to extend protection to the mechanic arts? It granted them. It yielded it. And except a formal act for taking the oaths, the very first act passed by Congress was to secure the coasting trade and protect the mechanic arts by discriminating duties, and thus carry out the clear, and, according to historical testimony, the most manifest object of the Constitution."

But hear what that great Democrat, Andrew Jackson, had to say on this important subject. In his second annual message to Congress (December 7, 1830) he said:

"The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry is so completely identical with that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws.

"This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them, and consequently if it be not possessed by the General Government it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely can not be the case; this indispensable power, thus surrendered by the States, must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress.

"In this conclusion I am confirmed as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended the exercise of this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people."

But further evidence on this point is superfluous, as it is all one way.

And yet in the light emanating from all the public declarations, not only of the founders of the Government, but also of the expounders of the Constitution, including those of every statesman of this country worthy of the name during the first quarter of a century of the existence of our Government, we find the distinguished and erudite junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], in his scholarly speech of a few days since, characterizing the honorable Finance Committee's recapitulation of the pending measure as a gilded cenotaph, marking the sepulchral abode of all the respect, traditional regard, and reverence which, according to the distinguished Senator, had in the first century of the Republic been paid to the law of the people.

The distinguished Senator is mistaken. The cenotaph to which he so eloquently points does not mark the burial-place of the principles of the founders and builders of the Republic on this great question. These, thank God, still live and will continue to survive, commanding the respect, traditional regard, and reverence accorded them, and the fundamental law from which they are evolved by the statesmen of earlier days; but if they ever do perish and die, on the monument which shall shadow their tomb shall be inscribed, "Strangled and entombed by the free-trade, tariff-for-revenue-only tinkers of modern Democracy!"

Notwithstanding this wealth of evidence contributed by the founders of our Government, and to which I have attracted attention; notwithstanding this "great cloud of witnesses" from among the illustrious men who framed the Constitution and gave to its various clauses interpretation in the primal days of the Republic—all vindicating and securely establishing the very policy sought to be enforced and perpetuated by the pending bill—our distinguished and eloquent colleague, the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], the peerless spokesman of his party, the impetuous champion of free trade from the sycamore-lined shores of the Wabash, in his eloquent speech a few days since proclaimed in his usual inimitable, captivating, and magnetic manner that "the bill under consideration is the result of a system of progressive evil—the offspring of a long-continued evolution in unjust taxation," a bill "springing from a parent stock whose life-germ is vicious, whose sap and vitality are imbued with a venom fatal to liberty and equality, the bold culmination, the climax of a series of oppressive enactments, * * * a financial monster" equipped with "claws with which to tear the fruits of labor from the farmer" and with "teeth with which to rend and crush his substance"—a measure, according to the distinguished Senator, whose authors are described as unlike "the romantic robbers of brilliant fiction," who are depicted "sometimes in the colors of chivalry, and as sparing the needy and distressed, while they politely preyed upon the opulent and the richly endowed," but who are, in the language of the senior Senator from Indiana, described as "the robber barons of this country, who do not belong to so refined a type as predaceous chevaliers."

Truly, Mr. President, if simple denunciation and invective, as distinguished from argument, clothed in well-rounded periods of finished rhetoric, is the standard by which the pending bill is to be judged, then indeed all will agree, without a dissenting voice, that the McKinley bill, as it passed the House and as modified by the Senate committee, must, before the irresistible avalanche of invective which literally saturated the speech of the Senator from Indiana, go down more speedily and to still lower depths than ever went poor McGinty, and I believe it is confidently and vigorously averred that he went "to the bottom of the sea." Indeed, in the absence of material for argument or just criticism, so vehement in his terms of denunciation of the measure did that distinguished Senator become, that as he proceeded the generous impulses of his nature, asserting their normal functions, called a sudden halt, and he involuntarily injected into his speech an apology to the Senate and the country for the use of terms in his characterization of this bill which he himself declared might "seem of unwonted severity."

The foregoing is in all respects applicable to the speech of the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] made in opening this debate, in which denunciation and invective constituted so prominent a part.

THE OPERATION AND EFFECT OF A TARIFF FOR REVENUE ONLY.

What is a tariff for revenue as distinguished from a protective tariff? In the one case—that of a tariff for revenue—the legislator has but one purpose in view—that is, to raise revenue—and he intends that his law shall have but that one function and effect, namely, to raise revenue. Now, this being so, he will inevitably, if he is honest, if he means that his law shall be one for revenue only and not for protection, either incidental or otherwise, place his duty in such a way as to produce the greatest possible amount of revenue from the least possible rate of duty. This is the course he must inevitably and invariably pursue if he wish to carry out the policy of a tariff for revenue only.

This being so, on what articles must he necessarily place his duty, and what articles must he place on the free list? Must the duty, in order to carry out his policy, be placed on those articles the like of which we can and do produce in this country, or on those articles the like of which we do not or can not produce in this country? Most assuredly on the latter. Consequently, by a revenue tariff we mean a tariff which imposes a tax on those articles of foreign production the like of which we do not produce in this country, or not at least in sufficient quantities to meet our demand, such as tea, coffee, sugar, and the like, while all those foreign products the like of which we do produce in this country shall be permitted to come in free and enter into competition with our home products and our home producers. This is the Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue only, and under such a theory it is true that the consumer pays the tax.

We hear very much about the tariff being a tax and that the consumer is compelled to pay that tax. This is true, Mr. President, always true in a Democratic tariff, or a tariff for revenue only, but only very seldom is it true and when true, then for only a brief period of time, under a tariff imposed in pursuance of a protective policy. All those products, therefore, which come into competition with our home products having been placed on the free list in pursuance of this Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue only, which necessarily requires that the duty shall be impressed on those foreign articles the like of which we do not produce here, what must necessarily be the result? Simply this: Our country will be flooded with every conceivable form of foreign product, and while the cost of some of these articles may and doubtless would for a brief time be cheapened to the consumer, it would only be for a very brief period and the American producer in most cases would be driven to the wall; home capital would be withdrawn from the various industries; manufactories, mills, and machine shops would be closed; furnaces would grow cold; fires would go out; laborers would lose employment by the thousand; wages would go down to those fortunate enough to retain employment; and the agriculturist, the growers of wheat, barley, oats, hops, prunes, potatoes, and the producers of other agricultural products, be compelled to compete with the unreasonable importations of these articles from foreign countries. And what would follow? The foreign importer by these excessive importations, having crushed out or driven to the wall the American producer and strangled American industries, would at once control the American market and as a necessary result, the necessaries of life would advance all along the line and the American consumer would suffer.

And not only so. But as a further consequence of such a policy, the money paid out by the American consumer under such a policy, instead of going into the pockets of the wage-workers of our country, instead of going into the pockets of our farmers and our manufacturers, would go into the pockets of the foreign importer to enrich him and aid him in his industrial warfare on American industries; and, more than all this, our country will be drained of its specie to pay the balance of trade against us; circulating medium will be contracted, prices of farm products will be depreciated; wages will fall, and poverty and distress will overwhelm the people.

CHANGE FROM SPECIFIC TO AD VALOREM DUTIES.

If there were no other reason why the pending bill should receive the disapprobation of Congress and the condemnation of the American people, the fact that it proposes to change the manner of levying customs duties from specific to ad valorem rates should be sufficient. The existing tariff law, as does every sensible law upon that subject, impresses its tariff in all cases wherein it is practicable by specific rates on specific quantities or things; that is, so much on each pound, each ton, each bushel, each yard, or other given quantity or thing.

This principle which has received the sanction of the ablest minds and best informed men of all political parties in this country, the present bill proposes to set aside and ignore and in its lieu levies ad valorem rates, or rates according to the value of the article imported—at the point of purchase in the foreign country, this value of course to be ascertained as best they can by the custom-house officials. Now, the number of yards of silk in a web, the number of bushels of coal in a bin, of potatoes or wheat in a ship, the number of pounds of any given quantity of merchandise usually sold by the pound, are all matters comparatively easy of ascertainment; whereas the market value or the price paid for any of these things in a distant foreign market may be and almost invariably is most difficult of determination.

This, therefore, is a departure in principle in favor of a system which it may be said without fear of successful contradiction has been almost universally condemned in the past by those best qualified to speak on the subject, and by none more severely or unsparingly than many of the great leaders of the Democratic party.

The system of ad valorem rates is one not only pregnant with temptation, but full of opportunities to the importer and foreign seller. It opens the door to perjury and invites all manner of fraudulent devices. It makes it possible for the importer, through fraudulent and doctored invoices, to evade the law and thus strike down whatever of protection to home industry and home labor, if any, is guaranteed by the law, and at the same time defraud the Government of the revenue properly due it under the law. And more than all this, it leads to interminable controversies and hearings before customs officials and in the Departments and endless litigation in the judicial courts. It will tend, moreover, to transfer the importing business from honest American importers to dishonest foreign importers.

I submit, Mr. President, the distinguished author of this bill is wide of the mark when, in his report in advocacy of the ad valorem system, he makes this declaration:

> Specific duties lead to greater frauds in administration, for counting and weighing at the custom-house are done by the cheapest and most easily corrupted labor.

Aside from this unwarranted assault on those public servants who, instead of receiving $14 a day as a member of Congress, are compelled to labor in the various custom-houses of the country for less than one-third of that amount, and on an average for double the number of hours each day, the statement is untenable as an economic and business proposition.

In proposing this change from specific to ad valorem rates the Democratic party arrays itself, as I believe, not only against the best interests of the Government and the people, but also goes back on its own established record and that of its greatest political leaders in the past.

It has been said here and elsewhere during this debate, and I believe the statement is not susceptible of successful contradiction, that every Secretary of the Treasury, from Hamilton to Manning, of whatever political party, who has spoken at all on the subject, has condemned the ad valorem system and given that of specific duties the preference. I shall not pause to collate these several statements. I shall, however, place in deadly parallelism the statement of the House Committee in their report on this subject and the declarations of Mr. Manning, Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Cleveland's first Administration. That report says:

> Under the tariff from 1846 to 1861 this system (ad valorem) was again tried and found to be as successful in administration as it was just in principle.

While Secretary Manning, in his report of December 7, 1885, in discussing this question, said:

> It is desirable that in revising and reducing rates of duty they should be made specific instead of ad valorem so far as the nature of the merchandise will admit. Theoretically considered ad valorem are preferable to specific duties, but in practice, under such rates as we have had and must continue to have for years to come, the former are the too easy source of deception and inequality at the custom house. Congress has it in its power to change from time to time, as may be advisable, specific rates, so as to meet any permanent change in values.
> One hears it often said that if our ad valorem rates did not exceed 25 per cent or 30 per cent, undervaluations and temptations to undervaluations would disappear; but the records of the Department for 1817, 1840, and 1857 do not uphold that conclusion. Whatever successful contrivances are in operation to-day to evade the revenue by false invoices, or by undervaluations, or by any other means, under an ad valorem system, will not cease even if the ad valorem rates shall have been largely reduced. They are incontestably, they are even notoriously, inherent in that system.

Either Secretary Manning, Mr. Cleveland's first Secretary of the Treasury, and all his predecessors in office from the beginning of the Government were wrong on this subject, or the policy of ad valorem rates, unless in cases where specific rates are impracticable, can not be right.

Prior to 1833 specific duties had been the universal rule in levying customs duties there being only rare exceptions, as now under the McKinley act, where the product or article is of such a nature or character that it is impracticable to levy the specific duty: and the adoption of the ad valorem system in 1833 was the result clearly not of deliberation and debate, but of a compromise without deliberation or debate. This clearly and graphically appears from the pen of Thomas H. Benton in his work Thirty Years in the United States Senate, volume 2, chapter 52, as follows:

AD VALOREM.

The introduction of the universal ad valorem system in 1883 was opposed and deprecated by practical men at the time as one of those refined subtleties which, aiming at an ideal perfection, overlooks the experience of ages and disregards the warnings of reason. Specific duties had been the rule—ad valorems the exception—from the beginning of the collection of custom-house revenue. The specific duty was a question in the exact sciences, depending upon a mathematical solution by weight, count, or measure; the ad valorem presented a question to the fallible judgment of men, sure to be different at different places and subject, in addition to the fallibility of judgment, to the chances of ignorance, indifference, negligence, and corruption.

All this was urged against the act at the time, but in vain. It was a piece of legislation arranged out of doors—christened a compromise, which was to save the Union, brought into the House to be passed without alteration, and was so passed in defiance of all judgment and reason by the aid of the votes of those—always a considerable percentum in every public body—to whom the name of compromise is an irresistible attraction; amiable men who would do no wrong of themselves, and without whom the designing could do but little wrong. Objections to this pernicious novelty (of universal ad valorems) were in vain urged then; experience, with her enlightened voice, now came forward to plead against them.

The act had been in force seven years; it had a long and a fair trial, and that safest of all juries—time and experience—now came forward to deliver their verdict. At this session (1839-'40) a message was sent to the House of Representatives by the President, covering reports from the Secretary of the Treasury, and from the Comptroller of the Treasury, with opinions from the late Attorneys-General of the United States (Messrs. Benjamin F. Butler and Felix Grundy), and letters from the collector of the customs in all the principal Atlantic ports, all relating to the practical operation of the ad valorem system, and showing it to be unequal, uncertain, unsafe, diverse in its construction, injurious to the revenue, open to unfair practices, and greatly expensive from the number of persons required to execute it.

The whole document may be profitably studied by all who deprecate unwise and pernicious legislation; but a selection of a few of the cases of injurious operation which it presents will be sufficient to give an idea of the whole.

Three classes of goods are selected—silks, linens, and worsteds—all staple articles, and so well known as to be the least susceptible of diversity of judgment, and yet on which, in the period of four years, a fraction over $5,000,000 had been lost to the Treasury from diversity of construction between the Treasury officers and the judiciary, with the further prospective loss of one million and three-quarters in the ensuing three years if the act was not amended.

The document, at page 44, states the annual ascertained loss during four years' operation of the act on these classes of goods to be: In 1835, $624,356; in 1836, $847,162; in 1837, $463,090; in 1838, $428,237, making in the four years $2,362,845; and the Comptroller computes the annual prospective loss during the time the act may remain unaltered at $800,000. So much for silks; now for linens. The same page, for the same four years, represents the annual loss on this article to be: In 1835, $370,785; in 1837, $303,241; in 1836, $516,988; in 1838, $226,375; making the sum of $1,411,389 on this article for the four years; to which is to be added the estimated sum of $400,000 for the future annual losses if the act remains unaltered.

On worsted goods for the same time, and on page 45, the report exhibits the losses thus: In 1835, $409,329; in 1837, $209,391; in 1836, $416,832; in 1838, $249,590; making a total of ascertained loss on this head in the brief space of four years amount to the sum of $1,285,142, with a computation of a prospective loss of $500,000 per annum while the compromise act remains as it is.

Such were the losses from diversity of construction alone on three classes of goods in the short space of four years, and these classes staple goods, composed of a single material. When it came to articles of mixed material, the diversity became worse. Custom-house officers disagreed, Comptrollers and Treasurers disagreed, Attorneys-General disagreed. Courts were referred to, and their decision overruled all. Many importers stood suits, and the courts and juries overruled all the officers appointed to collect revenue. The Government could only collect what they are allowed. Often, after paying the duty assessed, the party has brought his action and recovered a large part of it back. So that this ad valorem system, beside its great expense, its chance for diversity of opinions among the appraisers, and its openness to corruption, also gave rise to differences among the highest administrative and law officers of the Government, with resorts to courts of law, in nearly all which the United States was the loser.—Thomas H. Benton, Thirty Years United State Senate, volume 2, chapter 52.

Senator James Buchanan, afterwards President of the United States, and generally regarded, I believe, as a distinguished and very able Democrat, in a speech in this Senate, in discussing this question, said:

> I am not only opposed to any uniform scale of ad valorem, but to any and all ad valorem duties whatever, except where from the nature of the article imported it is not possible to subject it to a specific duty. Our own severe experience has taught us a lesson on this subject which we ought not soon to forget. Our ad valorem system has produced great frauds upon the revenue, whilst it has driven the regular American merchant from the business of importing and placed it almost exclusively in the hands of the agents of British manufacturers.

Subsequently, while President of the United States, in his second annual message, of December 6, 1858, Mr. Buchanan said:

> In my deliberate judgment, specific duties are the best, if not the only means of securing the revenue against false and fraudulent invoices, and such has been the practice adopted for this purpose by other commercial nations. Besides, specific duties would afford to the American manufacturer the incidental advantages to which he is clearly entitled under a revenue tariff.

And again in his fourth annual message, of December 3, 1860, President Buchanan said:

It is now quite evident that the financial necessities of the Government will require a modification of the tariff during your present session for the purpose of increasing the revenue. In this aspect I desire to reiterate the recommendation contained in my last two annual messages, in favor of imposing specific instead of ad valorem duties on all imported articles to which these can be properly applied. From long observation and experience I am convinced that specific duties are necessary both to protect the revenue and to secure our manufacturing interests that amount of incidental encouragement which unavoidably results from a revenue tariff.

Now, Mr. President, having made these general observations bearing upon the questions involved in the discussion of this great subject of such vital moment to the American people, I shall come to a consideration of some of the schedules in the pending bill and endeavor to show the disastrous effects the proposed changes in tariff rates will have on the industries affected and the general welfare and prosperity of the whole country. And what I shall have to say will relate in the first place and mainly to the agricultural schedule and to those products in the schedule in which the Pacific States and Territories are especially interested. And in this connection I make the bald statement, and challenge successful contradiction, that in no tariff bill heretofore enacted since the formation of the Government have the agricultural interests of this country been so mercilessly and unwarrantably assailed as in the pending bill. I shall first speak of sheep and wool.

SHEEP AND WOOL.

This bill, in so far as it deals with the sheep and wool industry, is arbitrary, invidious, and unjust. It places this great industry on the sacrificial altar and offers its ashes as a sacrifice to the avarice of the foreign woolgrower and to some extent the greed of the Eastern manufacturer, and transfers finally by operation of law to their coffers the great bulk of the $500,000,000 invested in it, and turns out of employment the 500,000 men employed in carrying it on. A bill which vouchsafes protection to the manufacturer and refuses to extend it to those engaged in the sheep industry, which favors the foreign producer at the expense of the home producer, is one which discriminates unjustly, unnecessarily, mercilessly, and cruelly against the agriculturist and in favor of the manufacturer, against the American and in favor of the foreigner.

I would not by one jot or tittle detract from that just measure of protection which even to a much greater extent is their due than is accorded the woolen manufacturers by this bill, but I demand that the proper equilibrium, the just proportion, the fair equalization, be maintained between the two great industries, whether it be on the basis of free trade or a protective tariff. This is not the case when protection to the extent of 40 or 45 per cent ad valorem is extended to the manufacturer, while no protection whatever is accorded the agriculturist. In my advocacy for the maintenance of the existing tariff on wool, I am pleading in behalf of an industry in which there are invested in this country the enormous sum of over $500,000,000. One-fiftieth part, or over $10,000,000 of this amount is invested in the State of Oregon, which I have the honor in part of representing on this floor.

No State in the Union has in proportion to its population so much money invested in this industry. It amounts to the sum of over $31 to each man, woman, and child in the State. The people of Oregon own 2,456,077 head of sheep, or an average of over 7¾ head to each man, woman, and child in the State. And so fine are our flocks we clip each year about 15,000,000 pounds of wool, or over 48 pounds per capita of the population of the State. And yet we are asked to support a bill which can not mean anything else than the absolute destruction within a very short time of this great industry.

Our 2,456,000 head of sheep were worth in 1892, under the fostering influence of the McKinley act, the sum of $6,150,000, or an average of $2.50 per head. They are to-day, under the threatening and death-dealing influence of the Democratic policy and the imminence of the destructive influence of the Wilson bill, worth less perhaps than $2,000,000. And enact this bill into law and the death rattle already heard in the throat of the sheep industry of the States of the Pacific coast and of this country will be emphasized by its absolute annihilation.

The wool product of Oregon in 1892, averaging about 15 cents per pound, aggregated about $2,578,800, while in 1893, averaging not over 7 cents, it aggregated less considerably than one-half of that amount.

In this connection I submit from the pen of Hon. W. W. Baker, editor of the North Pacific Rural Spirit, published at Portland, Oregon, and one of the most thoroughly informed men on the subject of the sheep industry on the Pacific coast, of date January 11, 1894, the following:

Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Utah, and that portion of Montana lying west of the Rocky Mountains own sheep as follows:

Oregon	2,456,077
Utah	2,117,577
Washington	872,825
Idaho	764,267
Western Montana	500,000
Total	6,710,746
These sheep were worth at end of 1892	$13,421,492
These sheep were worth at end of 1893	6,710,746
Loss	6,710,746

Allowing that our sheep will average 7 pounds, they would yield 43,475,222 pounds.

At 15 cents (as in 1892), it was worth	$6,521,283
At 7½ cents (as in 1893), it is now worth	3,260,642
Loss	3,260,641
Loss in sheep	6,710,740
Loss in wool	3,260,641
Total loss on both sheep and wool	9,971,411

There are 45,000,000 sheep in the United States; wool yield, 315,000,000 pounds.

45,000,000 sheep in 1892 were worth	$90,000,000
45,000,000 sheep are now worth	45,000,000
Loss in sheep	45,000,000
315,000,000 pounds of wool in 1892 was worth	47,250,000
315,000,000 pounds wool is now worth	23,625,000
Loss in wool	23,625,000
Total loss on both sheep and wool	68,625,000

How long will the sheep and wool industry of the country stand this?

I also attract attention to the following petition to Congress numerously signed by the woolgrowers, merchants, and business men of the North Pacific, regardless of party:

We, your petitioners, woolgrowers, merchants, and business men of the North Pacific, regardless of party, would respectfully represent as follows:

As a result of the general belief that wool will be put upon the free list, its price has fallen within the last twelve months from 15 cents to 6 cents per pound, and the value of our sheep from $2.50 to $1 per head. Under a free schedule foreign wools of a character competing with those grown in this section can be laid down in Boston to-day for 30 cents per scoured pound.

Allowing 70 per cent for shrinkage, our wools in the same market would be worth 9 cents per pound in the grease; and, deducting freight, scouring, and marketing charges, will leave to the grower a net value of 5 cents per pound—at least 5 cents a pound below the cost of the most economical production. It is our belief that if wool is placed on the free list there will be no advance in the values above submitted.

Woolgrowing is one of the most prominent industries west of the Rocky Mountains, and the continuance of the present range of values for our main product, which may be fairly looked for under free wool, will bring ruin to the sheep industry of the North Pacific and widespread loss and disaster to the mercantile and other interests dependent upon its prosperity. There are thousands of people in the North Pacific almost directly dependent upon the wool interests. With free wool one-half of these people would be obliged to seek a living and occupation elsewhere.

I also call attention to the following copy of resolutions of the North Pacific Sheep Breeders and Woolgrowers' Association, January 16, 1894. These were prepared, doubtless, by Hon. John Minto, president of the North Pacific Sheep Breeders and Woolgrowers' Association, a gentleman thoroughly conversant with the great subject and long connected with the Department of Agriculture as statistician:

Whereas the bill submitted by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee of Congress, changing the duties on imports, places upon the free list wool, coal, iron, ore, lumber, and other so-called raw material, while leaving, subject to reduced duties, most products of manufactures, is a manifestly unjust discrimination against the labor products which are the basis of manufacturing enterprises and places their producers in open competition with foreign labor; and

Whereas the effect of such unjust discrimination against raw materials as are basic in the relation to industries forming the finished products of commerce is an injury to the whole superstructure of national industries, from the apprehension of which the present calamitous business depression largely originated and continues to diminish the reward of labor or to dispense with its employment altogether, thus sowing the land with anxiety, want, and distress; and

Whereas wool production, which has been in a manner singled out by President Cleveland and his coworkers as one basic product upon which to try the effect of their scholastic theories of free trade, is an occupation engaging the capital and labor of more than 1,000,000 of American farmers and about 100,000 woolgrowers west of the Mississippi River as a special pursuit, producing 200,000,000 pounds of fleece wool and employing some 50,000 herdsmen, whose avocation as wagemen deserve and should receive as full protection under the law as any other occupation whatever; and

Whereas to place this industry of wool-production on the arid plains and mountains of our country in free competition in our own market with foreign producers on the more favored plains of South America or the government-aided woolgrowers of the perennial pastures of Australia is to surrender a great national industry to a destructive competition: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members and friends, without regard to party, of the North Pacific Sheep Breeders and Woolgrowers' Association, denounce the proposition to place wool on the free list as unjust in itself, and an unwise and unpatriotic attempt to surrender a national policy which has been maintained through a period of seventy years under Democratic, Whig, and Republican Administrations, always with greatest effect on the general welfare when most completely protected by law.

Resolved, That we join our fellow-citizens, the hundreds of thousands of textile workers of the Atlantic States, the National Woolen Manufacturers' Association, and the National Woolgrowers' Association, of the middle West, and woolgrowers, dealers, and manufacturers, of the Pacific Slope, in protest and remonstrance against the passage of a measure the apprehension of which has already decreased the value of the trade of textiles 41 per cent during the last half of 1893, as compared with that of 1892, indicating a decrease of values in the nation at large of billions of dollars.

Resolved, That the immense loss already inflicted by the apprehension of changes in our tariff laws threatened by the present Administration, supplemented as they are by a greatly diminished foreign trade, so seriously diminishing receipts into the United States Treasury, to the great embarrassment of the Government, justifies the apprehension that the effect of the Wilson bill, if passed, will surrender to foreign competition fully one-third the labor and business interests of the nation, affecting all industries, from the coal mines in the lowest levels to the shepherd on the highest mountains, from the poorest day laborer to the richest railroad owner, and fully justifies the present caution of the foreign importers as well as the American manufacturer; and further

Resolved, That should this bill, as reported, pass against the protests of hundreds of thousands of citizens, we ask the aid of our Representatives and Senators in Congress to add to it an amendment, or proviso, making it the subject of a national referendum vote, and not to take effect sooner than six months after it has been established as a law by a majority of the people. The uncertainty of the meaning of the people as expressed at the last national election, and the serious departure from a policy as old as this Government, demands deliberate action from the people.

Resolved, That the president and secretary of this association be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing resolutions to our Representatives and Senators, and urge upon them to do all in their power against the passage of the unjust Wilson bill.

JOHN MINTO,
President of North Pacific Sheep-Breeders and Woolgrowers' Association.

JANUARY 16, 1894.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow an interruption?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I know that neither the Senator nor his constituents would willingly do an injustice to the woolen manufacturers of this country. I wish to say, and have it go in the Senator's speech, that there is not one woolen manufacturer in fifty in the United States who has asked of this Congress that wool shall be put on the free list. Out of all the woolen manufacturers in Maine, and there are a great many there, there was only one who asked for free raw material in wool; and this bill has disgusted him so that he is no longer in favor of free raw material.

Then again, the Senator's constituents should be informed that there was not a member of the House of Representatives who represented the woolen manufacturing industries who voted for free wool. And another thing they should know. In the Senate there is not a Senator representing woolen manufacturing industries who under any circumstances will vote for free wool. On the contrary, they recognize the duty of Congress to protect the sheep-raisers and the woolgrowers just exactly as it protects the woolen manufacturers.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am entirely aware of the entire accuracy of the statement of the Senator from Maine. I am perfectly well informed upon that subject. I know that a most inconsiderable portion, if any, of the woolen manufacturers of the East desire or have asked for free wool. They certainly have not asked for it; on the contrary, they have protested against it, and only a very small minority of the wool manufacturers of the East have advocated free wool. The great bulk of those engaged in that great industry in the East are too wise, too thoroughly informed as to what the ultimate effect of free wool would be, not only on the wool industry in respect of its production as an agricultural product is concerned, but on their own manufacturing interests, to desire free wool in this country.

I stated, I think before the Senator from Maine came into the Chamber, that in so far as this bill is concerned it does not, in my judgment, give the woolen manufacturers that protection it should give them. What I did say was that there should be a fair deal all around.

Mr. GRAY. That is the protection doctrine—"a fair deal all around."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes, a fair deal all around. Certainly that is the protection doctrine. A fair deal to American industries and American labor, and not an unfair deal to all, as proposed by the pending bill.

Mr. GRAY. That is it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. A fair deal all around for the benefit of the great industries of this country. We certainly do not want an unfair deal, and this bill will result, if it ever becomes a law, in a most unfair deal.

Mr. GRAY. I merely want to thank the Senator from Oregon for that phrase. It characterizes the whole protection scheme.

Mr. FRYE. When the Senator makes a speech of that sort he ought to make it from his own side, the Democratic side, and not from this side of the Chamber. [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. We shall see a little later on as to how fair a deal is the pending bill.

When interrupted I was about to call attention to the sheep industry in the State of California. That will be discussed, however, more fully doubtless by the Senators from that State.

The State of California has grazing within her borders more than 4,500,000 head of merino sheep, which, had the price of wool not gone down under the approaching certainty of the removal of all duty on foreign wool by the incoming Democratic Administration, would have produced not less than 35,000,000 pounds of wool as against 175,000 pounds of wool, that being the total product of that State forty years ago. The total product in California in 1892 was 35,802,930 pounds, which sold in the San Francisco market for from 9 to 16 cents, according to quality, and at an average of 12½ cents, and netting about $5,000,000.

In this great industry of that State alone was invested some $75,000,000, giving employment to over 80,000 people. But owing to this ruinous reduction in the price of wool, coupled with the stringency in the money market, we are told hundreds and even thousands of woolgrowers in that State were unable to shear their fall clip in 1893, as no advances for that or any other purpose could be had on wool. The price for last fall had gone down from 9 to 16 to 3½ to 8 cents per pound, and from an average of 12½ to 5½ cents per pound.

Hon. Thomas McConnell, of Elk Grove, Sacramento County, Cal., one of the most prominent woolgrowers on the Pacific coast, with an experience there of over thirty-seven years, in a recent communication on the subject says:

The shrinkage in the past year on wool has been full 40 per cent below the prices of 1892.

The destruction and the annihilation of woolgrowing in California will be completed when wool is put upon the free list as proposed by the so-called Wilson tariff bill, now pending in Congress.

I voice the opinion of at least nineteen-twentieths of the woolgrowers, wool-dealers, and manufacturers of the Pacific coast.

I am also familiar with the sheep business as carried on in the States of Nevada and Oregon. They have some free ranges, which is more than overbalanced by the greater expense incurred in carrying on the business. They have to provide more or less feed for winter, railroad freights and provisions are much higher, and also herders are paid $35 per month and board.

In this connection I submit the following preamble and resolutions, passed at the convention of woolgrowers, wool-dealers, and wool manufacturers, held in the city of Sacramento, State of California, January 10, last. This convention was presided over by Hon. Barclay Henley, a leading and influential Democrat of the State of California, and an ex-member of the National House of Representatives.

Whereas it is proposed in the Congress of the United States to modify the existing tariff laws to admit wool and dressed meats free of duty; and

Whereas it is proposed to make sweeping reductions in the duties on woolen manufactures; and

Whereas thirty thousand citizens of California are employed directly in the production and handling of wool and mutton sheep and in woolen manufacture; and

Whereas the State of California contains approximately 4,500,000 sheep, producing annually 35,000,000 pounds of wool, and heretofore has profitably employed as sheep ranges 10,000,000 acres of land otherwise waste and of little value; and

Whereas in this industry an aggregate capital of $100,000,000 is invested in this State; and

Whereas it is our judgment, after full review of all the circumstances and conditions, that the proposed tariff changes, if carried into effect, would inevitably imply the destruction of the sheep industries of our State; that it would wipe out the capital employed in them and thus impoverish a multitude of our people; that it would drive a worthy element of population to seek other branches of employment already overcrowded, with the result of filling the highways, causing widespread suffering and beggary; and

Whereas we believe that we should not consume the products of foreign labor, leaving our own laborers in idleness, but that we should protect them and enable them to receive proper and fair compensation for that labor, consuming in our own country their products; and

Whereas the mere prospect of the proposed tariff changes has prostrated our business, scaled down the value of our property, and made alarm and apprehension of disaster widespread; and

Whereas it is a fact, established by experience, that at the price for wool now prevailing in the foreign markets our farmers can not continue the business of woolgrowing without absolute yearly loss; and

Whereas in proof of which we state that at the present time a large proportion of the sheep remain unshorn—and the shearers have even declined to accept the clip as compensation for shearing—during the past year, owing to the impending threat of free wool and radical reductions in the duties on woolen goods, the prices of domestic wools of all descriptions have fallen from 30 per cent to 50 per cent below the prices that prevailed a year ago, even at these figures there has been little demand for wool, and many farmers have on hand this season's clip, which at this time last year was being rapidly converted into goods by mills that now stand idle; in the United States the value of sheep has depreciated over $50,000,000—of this loss California's share is $5,000,000: Therefore, be it

Resolved, (1) That we, the wool and mutton growers and the woolen manufacturers of California in convention assembled, do protest in the most positive and solemn spirit against the free admission into the United States of wool and dressed meats, and against the proposed reduction in the duties on woolen goods; (2) that the good faith of the Congress of the United States requires continuance of the protective policy as to wool, dressed meats, and manufactured woolens; (3) that the sentiment of the business element of this State, regardless of partisan affiliations, heartily favor retention of tariff duties on wool, dressed meats, and woolen goods, and stands with us in protesting against the enactment of the Wilson bill in so far as it relates to the changes above named; (4) that the first duty of our representatives in Congress is to the interests of California; that to this duty they should subordinate partisan motives, and we call upon them in the name of the people of California to work and vote against the proposed changes in whatever form or whatever relationship they may appear.

We protest against and denounce as false and absurd the claim, persistently urged by advocates of free trade in wool, that American wools can not be manufactured successfully and profitably into the form of clothing, except in combination with foreign wools; and we deny that the importation of foreign wools is essential or even desirable as a means of consuming our domestic wool product, there being no class of foreign wools imported into this country that can not be produced by the woolgrowers of the United States.

We solemnly declare it to be our profound conviction that the principle of protection by tariff duties is essential to the independence and the comfort of the American people, to the promotion of liberal and wholesome standards of living and of education, and to the fullness and stability of our national life, this being the only barrier that prevents American children from being reduced to the level of the pauper nations of the earth.

The foregoing preamble and resolutions were passed at the convention of woolgrowers, wool dealers, and wool manufacturers held in this city January 10, 1894.

INDIANA ON WOOL TARIFF.

The nineteenth annual convention of the Indiana Woolgrowers' Association, at Indianapolis, in January, denounced the Wilson bill "as unjust" because, as its resolution declares, it "discriminates against the farming interest, by placing on the free list twenty-nine of the finished products of the farm, which twenty-nine articles are now protected by fair and equitable duties; and also makes a large reduction in the duties now properly assessed on twenty-one other finished products of the farm."

I quote the following from a communication recently received from Hon. Charles Hilton, of The Dalles, Oregon, a prominent business man, a wooldealer of Eastern Oregon:

It would be a terrible blow to Eastern Oregon should wool be placed on the free list. It would affect every branch of business in all of these eastern counties. It is conceded it would reduce the business of these towns fully 50 per cent. It would be impossible to farm the land where stock is now run. It is not farming land, and the bunch grass that years ago furnished good cattle range has been so overstocked that it has entirely disappeared and a small grass has taken its place which would not do for large stock, but upon which sheep thrive.

In this connection I desire to attract attention to what a leading citizen of Oregon, engaged in the business of woolen manufacture at Salem, in that State, says. The writer of the letter is Squire Farrer, a prominent manufacturer of that city. His letter is dated January 2, 1894, and addressed to myself. After discussing at some length the Wilson bill and especially its probable effect on the woolen-manufacturing industry of the country, he says:

As one engaged with others in the manufacture of woolen goods in this city, I can speak advisedly as to how President Cleveland's free wool policy is going to work. We are getting our wool, or as he calls it, "raw material" at half what we did a year ago—6 cents per pound, as against 12 to 14 cents last year. But where are our former customers? A year ago we had orders booked for future delivery which insured us a year's business. Now we have no orders ahead and no prospect of getting any, and every prospect of having to shut down and suspend operations indefinitely. Should the Wilson bill pass it is doubtful if one in ten of the manufacturing interests of all kinds west of the Rocky Mountains can live at all. The future business life of the producer and manufacturer of the United States will have to be saved, if saved at all, by the United States Senate in bringing about the defeat of the Wilson bill.

In this connection I desire to attract especial attention to the following Senate miscellaneous documents, second session, Fifty-third Congress, all bearing upon this important question and exhibiting facts and arguments which tend overwhelmingly to show the inadvisability of the enactment of the pending Wilson bill putting wool on the free list, namely, Senate Miscellaneous Documents Nos. 35, 77, and 124.

In these several documents will be found the very able, elaborate, and conclusive arguments of Hon. William Lawrence, of Bellefontaine, Ohio, president of the National Woolgrowers' Association and also president of the Ohio Woolgrowers' Association, in condemnation of the proposed free-wool proposition. To the facts, figures, arguments, and conclusions of these several executive documents the attention of the Senate and the country is urgently and respectfully requested.

Why should the wool-producers of this country be compelled to compete with the cheap labor, the cheap production, and the cheap rents of foreign countries? Why compel our people to compete with this character of labor in South America, where are produced over 460,000,000 pounds of wool annually? Why should we be called on to compete with the woolgrowers of Australia, where the sheep-grazing lands cost little, if anything, more than a cent per acre, and where the output of wool annually is over 600,000,000 pounds? Or with Russia, where labor is paid less than one-tenth it is in America, and where the annual output of wool is over 350,000,000 pounds? Or why, I ask, should we be called upon to compete with Southern Africa, Turkey, and Asia, where the price of labor in the matter of wool production is less than one-fifth that in America?

The recent reports from Australia, South Africa, and Russia show a great overproduction of wool, and a gradual decrease of the price of wool at the point of production even in those countries. This being so, what may we not expect in regard to the reduction in price of American wool if we place wool on the free list, as proposed by the pending bill? Bearing upon the wool industry in the State of Oregon, I submit with my remarks the following communication from the pen of A. M. Kelsay, esq., a prominent citizen and woolgrower of Eastern Oregon, published recently in the Daily Chronicle at The Dalles, Oregon:

THE DALLES, OREGON, February 27, 1894.

Editor Chronicle, The Dalles, Oregon:

DEAR SIR: I beg leave, through your valuable paper, to offer some facts and figures for the benefit of all, but more especially our Democratic sheepmen of Eastern Oregon. According to the latest statistics received from the Department of Agriculture, at Washington, which has been corrected up to January 1, 1894:

Number of sheep in United States	45,048,017
Average price January 1, 1893, $3.25	$146,406,055.25
Average price January 1, 1894 $1.98	$89,186,110.00
Difference in value of sheep January 1, 1893 and 1894	$57,219,945.25

This is the increased value we were promised by Democratic speakers and newspapers before the election of Mr. Cleveland and the Democratic party.

Let us examine the facts and figures as pertaining to our own State: The sheep and wool raisers of Oregon have lost, by depreciation in value, within the last year, according to statistics above mentioned, in regard to number and value of sheep in this State, January 1, 1894, the following amounts:

2,529,759 sheep, average price January 1, 1893, $3.50	$8,854,142.50
2,529,759 sheep, average price January 1, 1894, $1.75	4,433,403.00
Difference in value of sheep	4,420,739.50
17,000,000 pounds wool, average price January 1, 1893, 13 cents	2,210,000.00
17,000,000 pounds wool, average price January 1, 1894, 7 cents	1,190,000.00
Difference in value of wool	1,020,000.00
Difference in value of sheep	4,420,739.50
Total difference in value of sheep and wool	5,440,739.50

This represents the loss in value to the State of Oregon, in this industry alone, as everyone is aware who has any knowledge of the sheep business, that the money received from the sale of sheep and wool is not sent out to other countries, but is kept at home and put into circulation among our own people. There are several sheep men, with whom I am well acquainted, voted the Democratic ticket; they offered to wager any reasonable sum that within twelve months after election, "if Mr. Cleveland was elected, both sheep and wool would advance in price and times would be better than ever before in Eastern Oregon." Mr. Cleveland was elected, and the Democratic party successful in obtaining control of the Government. More than twelve months have rolled around. Now, how about the advance in the price of sheep and wool, and where does the increased prosperity and better times exist?

This can be answered by anyone, from the humble sheep-herder, who pursues his lonely and solitary life in the mountains and on the deserts of Eastern Oregon, to the shrewdest and most intelligent capitalist or bank president in our richest cities. They can all answer truthfully that it does not exist at all. The herder or laborer can answer intelligently from experience of his present condition of lower wages and that of being poorer fed and cared for. The capitalist can answer with good reason, that under the present conditions of Democratic rule and policy, it is unwise and unsafe to to put his money anywhere except in the vaults of the banks, and not always safe there; would submit to the loss of interest rather than risk losing the principal. It seems to me that the voters of Oregon with their present sad experience and severe lessons now being taught them would vote to send to Congress such a man as Mr. ELLIS and others, whom they know, by their past records, would defend and care for the interests of this State and especially those of Eastern Oregon.

Yours, respectfully,

A. M. KELSAY.

Also the following communication from a recent issue of the Times-Mountaineer, published at The Dalles, Oregon.

FREE TRADE AND WOOL.

Mr. J. B. Cartwright, a son of Hon. C. M. Cartwright, the manager of the Baldwin Sheep and Land Company, is in the city. He says the company has about 20,000 head of sheep in Crook County. The expense of shearing and placing wool in the market in Eastern Oregon will be about 3 cents a pound, he calculates, not taking into consideration the herders' wages, price of pasturage, and other expenses necessary in caring for flocks. The cost of the sheep, capital invested, contingency of hard winters and storage of fleeces in warehouses where sales are not made, must be added to this. Taking these matters into account, wool can not be placed on the market for less than 7 cents per pound, and this is not counting interest on investment, but simply the bare expenses of running sheep in Eastern Oregon.

With these figures, it is nonsense for any one to contend that sheep men in the inland empire can pasture their herds, shear their flocks, and sell the fleeces as cheaply as the Australian or Argentine woolgrower. There is only one possible effect of free trade in wool, and that is, it will drive all capital now invested in that industry into other lines of business. Mr. Cartwright says the company has made all arrangements for the sheep industry, and if they were forced to give up the business all the appointments would be sold at a great loss. In the management of their flocks they have made careful estimates, and do not theorize in their figures, but arrive at conclusions from many years of practical experience.

WILL FREE WOOL GIVE THE PEOPLE CHEAPER CLOTHING?

Why is it—upon what theory, based upon what supposed prospective benefit to the American people, or any considerable portion of them—that the Democratic party insists on placing wool on the free list? What great good is to come to the people of this country, or any class of our people, by permitting foreign wool to come in free that will not merely justify, but which to the mind of the Democratic Administration seems to demand this wholesale legislative destruction of this great American agricultural industry—an industry representing an invested capital, as we have seen, of over $500,000,000, an industry in the carrying on of which there is expended annually among laboring men $85,000,000, including the services of the million flock masters, one which engages the attention, time, services, and business talent of over a million flock masters, the owners of 45,000,000 head of sheep, with an output annually in wool, mutton, and pelts of over $110,000,000, an amount exceeding by more than one-fifth the total output of the gold and silver mines of America for 1892?

This pending bill is professedly a revenue bill solely. Now, the theory of a purely revenue tariff is that the duty shall be so arranged as to produce the greatest possible amount of revenue from the least possible rate of duty. Now, then, we consume in this country annually a little over 600,000,000 pounds of wool; to be entirely accurate according to what seems to be the best statistical report for the past year, 611,989,851 pounds, while we produce annually about 364,152,666 pounds. Our imports, therefore, in raw wool were in 1893 175,636,042 pounds, and in woolen goods about 114,145,473 pounds, making our total imports about 300,000,000 pounds.

From the Democratic standpoint, therefore, of a tariff for revenue only, what an opportunity there is presented of raising $36,000,000 of revenue, while at the same time protecting to a very great extent this great American industry? The objection to imposing the duty is perhaps to be found in the fact that it will have a tendency to give this industry protection, and would therefore be violative of the tariff plank of the Democratic platform of 1892. But, no, the pending Wilson bill, pressed forward by the Democratic majority of the Finance Committee of the Senate and backed up by the whole power of the Democratic Administration, casts aside this opportunity, makes wool free in the interest temporarily of 2,800 woolen manufacturers and in the interest of the flock owners of Australia, the Argentine Republic, and other foreign lands, and puts a tax of from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 on sugar, which is a part of the daily meal of every man, woman, and child of our entire 70,000,000 of people.

But, say our Democratic friends, by placing wool on the free list we cheapen the clothing of the masses of the people; and this seems to be the principal, if not the sole reason assigned by our Democratic friends for placing wool on the free list. Now, if it were to have this effect it would be a suggestion worthy of serious consideration in this connection; but it is respectfully submitted no greater economic fallacy was ever entertained, uttered, or sought to be maintained by either the most learned or the most visionary theorist.

The whole history of the doctrine and the practical effect of the doctrine of protection afford conclusive answers to this heresy. And the very fact that all kinds of woolen clothing are to-day infinitely cheaper in this country than they were prior to the levying of the McKinley tariff on wool in 1890 ought, in and of itself, to be a sufficient answer to this argument. But the real answer is to be found in the logical economic deduction which must inevitably follow and which invariably does follow in the wake of a policy which subordinates the great wool industry of this country to that of the foreign producers of wool, whether in Australia, the Argentine Republic, the South Sea Islands, or elsewhere.

Destroy practically the sheep industry of this country, as must inevitably be the case by placing wool on the free list, and we are at once, or at least in a comparatively short space of time, placed at the mercy of the producers of foreign wool. Then, instead of importing 300,000,000 pounds of wool, as now, we would be compelled to import double that amount to meet our demand for consumption.

Is it not apparent to every intelligent mind that so soon as this state of things is accomplished the price of foreign wool, even in the absence of the formation of a foreign trust, will be advanced to a figure largely beyond that now paid for American wool? And who, further, does not know or realize that then, there being no check of home production, the American market will be under the absolute control of the importers, of the few men who control the foreign flocks, and the result will be the formation of a great foreign wool trust by which the price of wool will be largely advanced, and then not only the American manufacturer, but the mass of the American people who wear woolen clothes, will feel the fearful consequences of free trade in wool?

But this is not all. This is only a part of the dreadful results of such an economic policy. This large excess in wool imports would annually drain our country of more than $60,000,000 in gold for wool and woolen goods, and when this lamentable state of affairs in our commercial and economic relations shall be wrought out under the policy involved in the pending bill, while it will bear heavily on all classes throughout the whole country, it will be the people, the manufacturers, the producers as well as the consumers of that great section of our country between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean who will suffer most. It will be a death blow to the woolen manufacturing industries of the Pacific coast. It will increase the price of woolen clothing to our people. It will destroy and take from our people one source of cheap, nutritious food. It will destroy and break down various other industries of different kinds dependent on the sheep industry. It will drive from our State a large proportion of our population, and will bring distress and poverty to our people.

The total estimated number of sheep in the world according to the statistician of the Department of Agriculture is 534,848,921. Of this number, according to this estimate, 47,273,563, or about 9 per cent, are in the United States, while the total product of wool in the world is 2,456,773,000 pounds, and this about equals the world's demand. If, then, we are not mistaken in the belief that free wool will destroy that industry in this country, it follows so surely as night succeeds day that the destruction of over one-eighth of the world's product can not but increase the price of the remainder, and this increase goes, not to our own people, but to foreigners, and with this increase the price of every woolen garment would be advanced.

In this connection I ask the privilege of inserting in my remarks the following circular issued by Justice, Bateman & Co., wool commission merchants of Philadelphia, issued March 4, 1894:

[Justice, Bateman & Co., wool commission merchants, 122 South Front street.]

PHILADELPHIA, March 1, 1894.

WHY SHOULD WOOL BE FREE?

No satisfactory reason can be given why wool should be exposed to the destructive influences of foreign competition. It is a necessity of our comfortable existence, and no army without wool could successfully conduct its operations in time of war. Wool is as much a munition of war as any other material. If coal is not to be considered a raw material, there is much more reason why wool can not be so considered, as it takes a whole year for a sheep to produce its fleece, yet coal in one hour can be got ready for market.

The element of labor in marketing a ton of wool exceeds many fold that which is expended in marketing a ton of coal, yet there seems to be much greater chance for a duty upon coal than upon wool. If unfavorable legislation should close the coal mines of this country for a thousand years, the coal would still remain there ready for use whenever the nation was once more permitted to resume its industrial activities. But when the flocks of sheep disappear as they are now doing, they can not be suddenly restored. If this industry is to begin anew, it will take many years to reach its present proportions, and if the blow now aimed at the woolgrowing industry is struck, it will cause its practical destruction. The ultimate result of this would be not only dependence upon foreign countries for our wool supply, but the loss to the nation of the value of the domestic clip, for, instead of distributing its cost among woolgrowers at home, to be spent at home, it must be paid in gold to foreigners with the ultimate result of higher prices for clothing. This would be a decided loss to the whole nation without any corresponding gain.

GROW OUR WOOL AT HOME.

The American sheep husbandry under adequate protection has twice made such rapid headway in the increase of flocks as to lead to the assurance that with the continuance of that protection we would soon produce the total amount of wool consumed by this country. During the last twelve years of the tariff law of 1867, the American clip increased 100 per cent, that increase being from 170,000,000 pounds in 1873 to over 340,000,000 pounds in 1884. If the duties had not been lowered at the end of that period, it is fair to assume that the same ratio of increase would have continued, in which case we would have produced in 1895 over 650,000,000 pounds, which, including the raw wool imported in the shape of manufactured goods, is the total amount of wool consumed by this country. A serious check to the growth of the wool industry was given by the reduction of duties in 1883, but with the restoration of a portion of those duties by the McKinley law in 1890, such an impetus was given to the woolgrowing industry that the clip again increased at a rapid rate. The increase was from 310,000,000 pounds in 1891 to 360,000,000 in 1893, so that if the McKinley law had not been assailed, it is fair to assume that by the year 1900 we would produce 650,000,000 pounds.

This country in the past has produced the equal of every quality of wool raised in any other part of the world. There is no quality of foreign wool the equal of which can not be and has not been produced in America. The only reason why certain qualities which were formerly raised here in great abundance are now imported, is because they are produced more cheaply in foreign countries.

In this connection I desire to insert in my remarks the following table of statistics, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, United States Treasury, showing the wool produced in each State and Territory of the United States from 1840 to 1891, as found in North's Wool Book, and for years since:

I also desire to bring to the attention of the Senate the following table, showing the relative production of wool in the United States and in the Argentine Republic from 1800 to 1890, reckoning by decades:

Production of wools in the United States and the Argentine Republic from 1800 to 1890, for years stated.

Year.	Amounts as shown by United States census.	United States.	Argentine Republic.
	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.
1800		7,925,840	1,200,000
1810		11,227,520	2,800,000
1820		14,100,500	3,750,000
1830		17,329,870	5,940,000
1840	35,802,114	51,925,640	14,965,250
1850	52,516,959	89,985,400	24,864,300
1860	60,264,913	111,976,950	55,885,760
1870	100,102,387	154,500,680	166,987,500
1880	240,681,751	240,680,750	259,824,840
1890		271,342,200	295,425,200

From this latter table a startling fact is made to appear. While in 1850 the Argentine Republic produced but 55,885,760 pounds of wool, in 1890 that same Republic produced 295,425,200 pounds, or 15,996,400 pounds more than five times the product in 1850. The increase in the Argentine Republic in the last twenty years has been over 128,000,000 pounds.

Australia in 1870 produced but 179,459,780 pounds, and twenty years later (1890) the product was 400,879,240 pounds.

In Asia the wool product in 1870 was but 134,507,120 pounds, while two decades later (1890) the product was 264,860,050.

In Africa the increase has not been so marked, although even there the increase in the last twenty years of the annual product has been over 10,000,000 pounds.

The wool product of Russia in 1887 was 262,966,000 pounds, while in 1891 it was 291,500,000 pounds.

The product in France in 1887 was 80,138,000 pounds, while in 1891 it was 124,803,000 pounds.

According to the summary statement of the imports and exports of the United States for January, 1894, corrected to March 10, 1894, the fact appears that there were imported into the ports of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia during the single month of January last raw wool to the amount of 2,734,406 pounds, 558,234 pounds of which came from Russia (the Black Sea), 196,521 pounds being produced on the Baltic in Russia, 107,970 pounds of which were shipped from the Baltic and the balance from England; while China sent us 484,238 pounds during that period, and Turkey in Asia 318,025 pounds.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Senator give in his speech a table of the aggregate of the wool productions for a series of years, to show how the production of wool has been affected by tariff legislation?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I think not; but, with the consent of the Senate, I shall insert a table of that kind.

Mr. PALMER. If I may trespass upon the Senator, I wish to ask him if he has made statistics of the wool product of the United States?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I have.

Mr. PALMER. What has been the increase?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The increase was large until the tariff was reduced in 1883. Then, for a number of years there was a decrease, because the tariff of 1883 largely reduced the rates fixed in the tariff of 1867; but when the McKinley act was enacted in 1890, for the next two years there was a very perceptible increase in the number of sheep and in the production of wool.

Mr. PALMER. Is the Senator aware of the fact that there has been a steady decrease in the price of wool from 1890 until now, under the McKinley law?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There has been a decrease in the price of wool since the date of the passage by the Democratic House of Representatives, during the last Congress, of the bill placing wool upon the free list.

Mr. PALMER. I wish to ask further, whether the Senator does not know that since 1890, and long before, there was a decline in the price of wool?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There were some fluctuations in the price of wool, but during the years 1891 and 1892 the price was such that there was no complaint in this country, certainly not in our part of it.

Mr. PALMER. I will state to the Senator that there was a marked decline in the price of wool in the United States in the years 1890, 1891, 1892, and 1893.

Mr. HAWLEY. That was the case the world over.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. As the Senator from Connecticut says, that was the case the world over. That was the result, of course, of overproduction to a certain extent in other countries—in Australia, in the Argentine Republic, in Africa, and also in Russia; and that depression, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, was not confined to the United States, but was noticeable throughout the world.

Mr. PALMER. Then I apprehend the Senator will admit that protection as given by the McKinley act has not been sufficient to keep the price of wool up to the price it was before 1890?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes, I might perhaps be willing to admit that; but at the same time I would connect with that admission the statement that but for the McKinley act prices would have been infinitely lower in this country than they have been.

Mr. FRYE. The prices in this country were nearly the amount of the duty higher than they were in London.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is a fact, and I call attention to the fact that the price of wool in the West is now and has been during the past year a little less than one-half what it was in 1892.

Mr. PALMER. Notwithstanding the McKinley law is still in force.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Ah, Mr. President, that is true, but under sentence of death, I apprehend, and it has been so since the result of the election of 1892 was known.

Mr. PALMER. I trust that I may venture to express the hope that the Senator is right in his statement that that law is under sentence of death. But conditions must be very alarming when even an apprehension of the repeal of the McKinley law disturbs the business of this country.

Mr. HAWLEY. It does.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Conditions are alarming.

Mr. PALMER. They must be alarming conditions which make even the slightest suspicion or apprehension of disturbance produce ruinous results.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, that is a very singular argument from the Senator from Illinois. Here are two great policies advocated by the Republican and Democratic parties in this country. Upon the one hand we say that the protective policy is the proper policy, and that that policy enforced is a policy in the interest of the agriculturists, of the manufacturers, and of the producers, as well as of the consumers of this country; while the other policy we regard, and we believe the great majority of the people of this country regard, as being in opposition to the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the United States.

Is it strange that the effect should be at once noticeable upon the various industries of the country when the Democratic party succeeded to power, and when the people engaged in those industries believe and have a right to believe that it intends to enforce a policy which will result in their destruction?

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator allow me one moment further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. If it be true that the protective policy assumes to control and influence the business of the country, takes it out from under the influence of natural causes, and produces purely an artificial state of things, it is one of the strongest arguments against protection. But the Senator is mistaken. The conditions, the scene of desolation and ruin around us, are the result of protection carried to extravagant and excessive lengths.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should be glad to discuss this question further, but I am anxious to conclude my remarks by 5 o'clock.

Mr. PALMER. Very well.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the bearing of the pending bill upon the production of barley in this country. That is another agricultural product assailed by the bill.

BARLEY.

Barley is another agricultural product assailed by the pending bill. True, barley is comparatively an unimportant industry compared with those of wheat, wool, lumber, hay, poultry, and other agricultural productions, all of which fall under the baneful ban of this proposed legislation. According to the report of the Department of Agriculture for 1893 there were produced in this country that year 69,869,495 bushels of barley, grown on 3,220,371 acres of land and of the value of $28,729,386. Of this amount 21,633,516 bushels, or within a fraction of one-third of the whole amount, were raised in the States and Territories west of the Rocky Mountains, as follows:

	Bushels.		Bushels.
California	17,116,110	Nevada	280,923
Washington	1,860,961	Arizona	298 971
Oregon	975,096	Utah	236,993
Idaho	308,910	Montana	156,008
Colorado	366,315	New Mexico	33,229

The two Dakotas raised 5,229,084 bushels in nearly equal proportions in the two States—the crop of North Dakota being 2,841,853 bushels, and that of South Dakota 2,383,231 bushels. More than one-half of the entire crop was grown west of the Mississippi River, the State of Iowa alone producing 11,599,066 bushels, and Minnesota 9,268,011 bushels.

The present duty under the McKinley act is a specific duty of 30 cents a bushel. The pending bill as it came from the House reduces it to 25 per cent ad valorem, which according to the present price of barley, about 50 cents, is equivalent to a specific duty of only about 12½ cents per bushel, or a reduction of considerably over one-half. The bill as it comes from the Senate committee fixes the duty at 30 per cent ad valorem, which is but a slight improvement. The effect of the McKinley act on this agricultural industry, as on all others affected by it, was marvelous. The average of the acreage of barley in the United States from 1881 to 1889 was but 2,563,511 acres, whereas the acreage in 1893 was 3,220,371 acres, or an increase over this average of 656,860 acres.

Again, the average annual product from 1881 to 1889 was but 54,992,294 bushels as against a crop of 69,869,495 in 1893, or an increase of 14,877,201 bushels. But not only so. Mark the effect on foreign (Canadian) importations. During the four years—1887–1890, inclusive, immediately preceding the passage of the McKinley act, during which period the duty was but 10 cents per bushel, we imported an average annually of 10,875,147 bushels, or 43,490,579 bushels of the aggregate value for this period of $27,602,977; and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, the year immediately preceding the operation of this act, we imported from Canada 11,327,052 bushels of barley and 213,135 bushels of malt, whereas during the last year (1893) our imports were but 1,969,761 bushels of barley and 24 bushels of malt.

The United States produces enough and much more than necessary to meet the home essential demand for barley. The beer industry of the United States requires but a little over one-third of the home product in the manufacture of beer, or only about 25,000,000 bushels annually, as against nearly 70,000,000 bushels produced last year. Our surplus is used mainly by being ground into animal food. Canada has an immense surplus produced at a cost much below that of American barley, and with free trade or a revenue ad valorem duty, which does not protect, which is the same thing, that country will be enabled to flood the United States with from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 bushels annually, and thus depreciate the price, drive the American farmer from its production, stop its cultivation in this country, and among other distressing circumstances render useless large tracts of land in the Northwestern and extreme Western States, suitable for raising barley, but unsuited for other cereals or other purposes.

HOPS.

Hops is another agricultural product at which a paralyzing blow is struck by the Wilson bill. Prior to the McKinley act the duty on hops was 8 cents per pound; under that act it is 15 cents per pound, or equivalent to 36.21 per cent ad valorem. The bill as it passed the House reduces the rate from 15 cents to 8 cents per pound, or equivalent to 19.28 per cent ad valorem, while the Senate committee changes this to 20 per cent ad valorem.

Now, what has been the effect of the increased duty on foreign hops placed there by the McKinley act? During the three years 1887–1889, immediately preceding the passage of that act we imported into this country 28,299,240 pounds of hops of the value of $5,577,636, or an average for these three years of 9,433,080 pounds, of the average annual value of $1,859,212; whereas in the three years, 1891–1893, since the enactment of the McKinley law we have imported but 9,217,071 pounds, of the value of but $3,756,514, or an annual average importation for these three years of but 3,072,300 pounds of the average annual value of $1,255,505, while for the past year, 1893, our importations were but 2,657,365 pounds, of the value of $1,100,878.

The effect of the protective policy as expressed in the McKinley act is still more apparent in our exportations of hops. During the three years, 1887–1889, immediately preceding the passage of the McKinley act, we exported but 19,643,801 pounds of hops of the aggregate value of but $4,081,862; whereas for the three years, 1891–1893, following the McKinley act, we exported 32,707,796 pounds, of the aggregate value of $7,443,843. These exportations ranged as follows: In 1891, 8,736,080 pounds, of the value of $2,327,474; in 1892, 12,604,686 pounds, of the value of $2,420,502, and in 1893, 11,367,030 pounds, of the value of $2,695,867.

When this country can and does produce more than 43,000,000 pounds of hops annually, of the value of more than $11,000,000, and exports one-fourth of that amount to foreign countries, why, upon what pretext, or for what purpose, should we open the ports of our country to the foreign hop grower? Surely, if with a duty of 15 cents per pound, the foreign hop-grower is enabled to invade the American market to the extent of over 3,000,000 pounds annually, of the value of $1,250,000 at least, what may we not expect in the way of increased importations and reduced prices when that duty is lessened nearly one-half.

"Oh," say our Democratic friends, "we want to cheapen beer to the beer drinkers of this country." But does any sane man believe for a single moment that the cheapening of the price of hops will cheapen a glass of beer to the person who drinks it, even to any extent whatever? If this proposed destruction of the hop industry of this country could be justified for one moment for this alleged reason, then it becomes worth while to inquire to what extent such a policy would result in cheapening the production of beer in this country. And here it may be said, although this reduction of duty should not destroy hop culture and its production in the United States, even then it is only claimed by the advocates of a reduced duty that such reduction would reduce the cost of a barrel of beer not exceeding 6 cents. This would be about 2 mills a gallon, or 1½ of a mill or one-fortieth part of a cent a pint. But even this infinitesimal fraction would not be saved to the beer drinker—not by any manner of means—but to the brewers of this country, the wealthiest class of people in the country.

Most of the breweries, as we know, moreover, are owned and controlled by foreigners residing abroad. Not only so. We are not unmindful of the immense combine of the brewery interest, of the immense amount of foreign capital invested in this country in that industry and owned and controlled abroad. So, Mr. President, it comes to this at last. This Democratic administration, in order to give a gratuity to this great monopoly of 6 cents a barrel on their manufacture of beer, are willing to strike a deathblow to the farmer who is engaged in the laudable business of hop culture in this country, while at the same time under such a policy the beer drinkers of the country will be compelled to pay their little old 5 cents a glass just the same as before.

In considering this subject, it must not be forgotten that the Pacific States are admirably adapted to hop culture and the item of transportation should not be overlooked. Germany can ship hops to New York for about one-third the amount it costs the Oregon hopgrower to ship to that point. This fact taken in connection with the further fact of the great difference between the cost of American and German hop labor and the cost of production in the two countries, it is clear that a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem, as proposed by the pending bill, is no protection at all. Most certainly not to the hop producers west of the Rocky Mountains. And it must not be forgotten, moreover, that about 50 per cent of the hops produced in the United States are raised in that section. Oregon alone produces over 7,000,000 pounds.

We produce all the best varieties and of superior quality. The hop production in the Pacific States has under the protection afforded by the McKinley act increased since the passage of that law more than 35 per cent. In 1893 there were produced 25,000,000 pounds in the States of California, Oregon, and Washington, and it is estimated the crop for the present year in these three States will exceed 30,000,000 pounds.

In this connection I attract attention to the following article on this subject published in the Oregon City Enterprise of a recent issue, published at Oregon City, Oregon:

HOP GROWERS HO—DO YOU WANT TO COMPETE WITH CHEAP FOREIGN GOODS—FREE HOPS WILL RUIN PRICES—PACIFIC COAST DEALERS AND GROWERS REMONSTRATING AGAINST SUCH A DESTRUCTIVE POLICY.

The hopmen of the Pacific coast have begun an organized movement against congressional interference with the tariff on hops. They claim that if the duty is removed or lessened it will paralyze one of the greatest industries of this section. Last Friday a message was sent to Senators DOLPH, PERKINS, WHITE, and SQUIRE, and signed by all the hop merchants of San Francisco, irrespective of party, and by Mr. Meeker, the Puyallup hopman. The dispatch was as follows:

The proposed reduction in the tariff on hops from 15 cents a pound, specific duty, to 20 per cent ad valorem would result in great injury to a large and growing industry on the Pacific coast. In 1893 25,000,000 pounds were produced in California Oregon, and Washington, and the coming crop is expected to yield over 30,000,000 pounds. We respectfully request you to use your best endeavors to resist such a reduction. In a season of low prices an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent is equivalent to placing hops on the free list. Under the circumstances, and if the reduction can not be obviated, a duty of 8 cents per pound, as recommended in the Wilson bill, would be no more than just.

The merchants signing the telegram have written to the various hop-growers' associations asking their coöperation in the matter. The associations are requested to hold meetings and draw up resolutions remonstrating against this measure, and forward them to the delegation at Washington.

Under the McKinley bill the duty on foreign hops was 15 cents a pound; the Wilson bill reduces it to 8 cents, and now the Senate has changed it to 20 per cent ad valorem. When foreign hops are cheap it will be seen that under the new deal they will be practically free. It is a recognized fact that German and Bohemian hops are superior to ours. This is demonstrated by the readiness with which American brewers have purchased foreign hops while the McKinley tariff has been in effect. The brewers have paid as much, with the duty, as 45 cents for German and Bohemian hops, when the Pacific coast article could be had for 17 cents a pound. With the duty removed, or reduced to a minimum figure, it looks as though our hops would not be "in it." Theodore Bernheim, a Portland hop dealer, has been active the past few days informing growers throughout the State of the exact situation and the danger which confronts them. He has urged them to meet and take such action as will call the attention of Oregon's Senators and Representatives at the national capital to this important question. Discussing the matter yesterday, Mr. Bernheim said:

"Hops have been one of the best investments in the State. Last year, hops brought more money into the Willamette Valley than wheat did. There is every prospect that if the bill passes placing 20 per cent ad valorem duty on this staple product, it will be ruin to hop culture on the Pacific coast. It will be throwing money into the lap of Germany and other foreign hop countries. Brewers will then assuredly buy their hops in Europe. Hops that are worth in Germany, say 20 cents a pound, could be easily invoiced at 10 cents, which would only make 2 cents a pound duty, and that would not cut any figure in buying. When there is a full crop in Germany or Bohemia, that is, when they can spare one-third of their yield, the United States would be swamped with their hops, and it is not necessary to say what the consequence would be to growers here; the result of such a state of affairs is only too apparent. Oregon last year produced 38,000 bales of hops. This year, according to the acreage, the elements permitting, the State will yield 50,000 bales. The present indications are that prices will rule low."

Attention is further attracted to the following communication of Mr. Fred S. Meeker, of the State of Washington, who for a number of years past has been one of the most extensive hop raisers in that State. It was published in a recent issue of the Sheridan Weekly Sun, published at Sheridan, Oregon:

PACIFIC COAST HOPS.

Fred S. Meeker has compiled the following estimates from the best information at hand on the yield, sales, and amount of the hop crop for the year 1893 in the three Pacific States—California, Oregon, and Washington: Washington has shipped during September, October, and November, 22,746 bales; stock on hand December 15, 6,000 bales; total crop for 1893, 38,746 bales. Oregon shipped during September, October, and November, 35,159 bales; stock on hand December 15, 2,000 bales; total crop for 1893, 37,159 bales.

California has shipped during September, October, and November, 38,800 bales; stock on hand December 15, 4,200 bales; total crop, 43,000 bales. Total crop for Pacific coast, 1893, 118,909 bales; stock on hand December 15, 1893, 12,200 bales; shipments direct to London from Washington, 10,500 bales. This shows an increase of over 100,000 bales since 1882, as in that year the total output of this coast was about 12,500 bales, and then 81 per pound was received. The highest price paid since was 40 cents, in 1890. The average price paid in the different years was as follows: 1883, 18 cents; 1884, 10 cents; 1885, 8 cents; 1886, 30 cents; 1887, 15 cents; 1888, 25 cents; 1889, 13 cents; 1890, 35 cents; 1891, 16 cents; 1892, 18 cents; 1893, 16 cents. This is the average price paid during the years quoted, a price which stood for two months after harvest, and is not the highest price paid any year to those growers who were fortunate enough to get the higher price offered. The average price for the eleven years is 18½ cents. This statement, made by Mr. Meeker, is very valuable, as he has facilities for gaining knowledge in this direction which many other people have not.

Mr. GRAY. What are hops worth a pound?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I can not state exactly the present price.

Mr. DOLPH. The price will vary very greatly from year to year.

Mr. GRAY. Can the Senator give somewhere near the value?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Hops were as high as 35 cents a pound in Oregon two years ago; I think they were higher than that, perhaps, but they rate much lower at present, as do all agricultural products. This concludes what I have to say on the subject of hops, and I now come to hay.

HAY.

Here again one of the most important agricultural products of the country—hay—is made to feel the remorseless scythe of the Wilson bill. Few people realize the immense magnitude of this interest and the grand development made in it in this country under the protective system.

In 1870 the hay acreage in the United States was but 19,861,805 acres, yielding 24,525,000 tons of hay of the home value of $338,969,680; while in 1880 the acreage had increased to 25,863,955 acres, producing 31,925,233 tons of the home value of $371,811,084; while in 1893 the acreage had reached the enormous figure of 49,619,469 acres. The product was 65,766,158 tons of the home value of $570,882,872, or more than double the value of the cotton crop, which in 1888 was $292,139,209; $144,540,110 more than twice the value of the wheat crop in 1893, the latter being but $213,171,381; nearly fifteen times greater than the tobacco crop, which was but $39,155,442 in 1893, and more than five times the value of the potato crop, which in 1893 was $108,661,801, and within a fraction of as much in value as the corn crop of 1893, which was $591,625,627.

The tariff on foreign hay under the existing law (the McKinley act) is $4 per ton, and, notwithstanding this rate of duty, we imported from Canada for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, 104,181 tons of the value of $962,221.51, on which we collected a duty of $416,724.86. The year ending June 30, 1890, prior to the passage of the McKinley act, we imported 124,544 tons of hay of the value of $1,143,445. The Wilson bill as it came from the House reduced the duty just one-half, that is, to $2 per ton, while the Senate committee has changed this specific duty to an ad valorem of 20 per cent, which is a fraction of at least 1.65 per cent less, according to the report of the committee, than the House bill, the per cent being thus stated in the report of the committee—average ad valorem—under existing law, 43.31 per cent; under the House bill, 21.65 per cent, and under the Senate bill, 20 per cent.

When, therefore, we take into consideration the fact, that must be conceded by all, that the general cost of agricultural production in Canada, including barley, hay, and several other products, is about 44 per cent lower than in the United States, and the further fact of the great surplus of hay produced in that country (Canada), it is easily to be seen that this proposed legislation is on this one subject of hay, as it is on nearly every other agricultural product, a direct blow at the pockets of the American farmer and American laborer on farms and in the direct interest of the Canadian farmer and the Canadian laborer on farms.

As indicating the large surplus of Canadian hay that would be run into this country under the proposed legislation, the fact may be noted that there was exported to Europe through the ports of New York and Boston alone, in the last eight months, 8,193 carloads of hay, 90 per cent of which, or 7,373 carloads, was Canadian hay going in bond.

PLUMS AND PRUNES.

In no Western industry were the beneficial effects of the McKinley act more clearly exemplified than in stimulating the prune industry and the fruit industry generally. Take plums and prunes, for instance, and mark the effect of this act in reducing the importation of foreign plums and prunes into this country.

Take the importations for the three years immediately preceding the passage of the McKinley act. In 1887 we imported 92,032,625 pounds of plums and prunes of the value of $2,999,648; in 1888, 70,626,027 pounds of the value of $2,197,150, and in 1889, 46,154,825 pounds of the value of $1,423,304, or an aggregate in these three years of 208,813,477 pounds of the aggregate value of $6,620,102, or an average annual importation for these three years of 69,604,492 pounds of the average annual value of $2,206,701.

Now compare with this the reduced importation for the three years succeeding the passage of the McKinley act. In 1891 we imported 34,281,322 pounds of the value of $2,540,486; in 1892, 10,886,797 pounds of the value of $437,271, and in 1893, 23,225,821 pounds of the value of $1,049,896, or an aggregate for these three years of but 68,393,940 pounds, or 140,418,537 pounds less than we imported for the three years 1887–1889, and of the aggregate value of $4,027,653, or less in value by $2,592,449 than we imported during the three years 1887–1889. The average, it will be seen, of our importations for the three years since the enactment of the McKinley act is 22,797,980 pounds of the value of $1,342,551, as against average importations for the three years preceding the passage of the McKinley act of 69,604,492 pounds of the average annual value of $2,206,701.

The McKinley act under which this great improvement has occurred and which has resulted in the investment of millions of dollars in prune lands in California, Oregon, Idaho, Washington, and other Western States and in converting hundreds of thousands of acres of land, heretofore much of it unproductive, into extensive and profitable prune orchards, imposed a specific duty of 2 cents per pound, which is equivalent at ruling prices to about 45 per cent ad valorem.

The Wilson bill, as it came from the House, changed this to an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent, thus reducing the duty five-ninths of a cent, while the bill as it now stands places the duty at 30 per cent ad valorem, which is still a reduction of existing rates of one-third. The effect of this reduction, should it become a law, will unquestionably be to create discouragement in the minds of thousands of our citizens engaged in this grand industry, of which any country should be justly proud; it will drive away capital, and the development of this luscious fruit will receive a most serious and paralyzing shock.

The protection tendered by the pending bill to the prune industry is a delusion and a snare; it will not cover even one-half the difference in the cost of labor in producing prunes in this country and in France, Italy, or Germany. That difference is nearly 2 cents per pound—certainly not less than 1¼ cents per pound. And when we consider this subject in reference to the effect upon prune-growing in the far West, the distance from the Eastern market, the great cost of transportation as compared with that from France and Italy to this country, it will be seen at a glance that under the proposed duty it will be absolutely impossible for the prune-growers of California, Oregon, Washington, and Idaho to compete in the great American markets with the prune-growers of France, Italy, and Germany.

The cost of transporting prunes from the Pacific States to New York, Boston, and Philadelphia is more than, or at least quite, treble that of transporting the same article from France and Italy to these American ports. The truth is, under the present duty of 2 cents per pound, the foreign producer still has the advantage over the American producer in the American market. Especially is this the case with reference to the prune industry west of the Rocky Mountains. Yet, notwithstanding these facts, so absolutely transparent and apparent to all who have the disposition and capacity to investigate the subject, our Democratic friends will persist in this un-American assault upon this great industry, thus legislating for the German, the Frenchman, and the Italian in foreign lands and against the real interests of Americans in our own country.

In this connection, and as intelligently and truthfully bearing on both the fruit and wool industry of Oregon, I beg attention to the following letter received by me from Hon. H. W. Cottle, president of the Board of Trade of Salem, Oregon, and also president of the Horticultural Society of Marion County, Oregon, a gentleman thoroughly well informed on the subjects touched upon by his letter. He says:

SALEM, OREGON, December 21, 1893.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: The State of Oregon * * * never saw the time in its entire history when it needed help in Congress as at the present time. The very threat of the passage of the Wilson tariff bill is spreading ruin all over our fair State.

As president of the Board of Trade of this city, and president of the Marion County Horticultural Society, as a fruit-grower and private citizen of Oregon, I desire to protest against the passage of this most iniquitous measure.

We have thousands of fruit-growers who have planted their orchards during the past few years and have tended them patiently, hoping for their reward when they came into bearing, and now, just as they are about to reap the reward of their toil, comes the threat of the passage of this bill, which would cause a despair like the blackness of night among them, as it means their ruination.

They are differently situated from the agriculturists. It takes years to develop and give them a return from their orchards, which are just now coming into bearing. They can not compete with the cheap labor of Turkey and other fruit-growing districts of Europe, and neither can they lay down their produce in the city of New York as cheap, owing to the high freight rates from this coast. The passage of this bill means the neglect and abandonment of the ranges heretofore occupied by our woolgrowers. It means that the busy hum of our lumber mills will cease. It means general depression and poverty for our State.

While, on the other hand, its defeat and retaining the protection of the McKinley bill means beautiful homes all over our land, and prosperous, happy, well-clothed, and well-fed people. Our people are looking to you for help. They are watching the action of Congress as they never watched it before since the breaking out of the rebellion. We trust that you will use every effort within your means, that you will leave no stone unturned to defeat this bill.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Very truly yours,

H. W. COTTLE.

Hon. J. H. MITCHELL,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

The States of California and Oregon under the policy of protection have developed into fruit gardens, the most magnificent and prolific in the world. From the most delicate tropical fruits to the more hardy varieties of Northern climes, including oranges, olives, grapes, figs, lemons, prunes, plums, peaches, apples, pears, berries of all varieties and of the most delicious quality, here is an abundance of all. Millions of productive capital are invested in their cultivation; hundreds and thousands of our people are giving their time, their talents, and their means to the horticultural and viticultural industries in these States; and yet nearly every one of these is ruthlessly assailed by the Wilson bill. The Pacific Coast produced over 40,000,000 pounds of cured prunes in 1893, and it is estimated, if the protective policy should remain unchanged, and the trees now planted in California are permitted to reach their maturity and full productive capacity, that that State alone will produce 150,000,000 pounds, and Oregon 50,000,000 pounds of cured prunes.

HORSES.

The American horse and cattle industry is also borne down on heavily by the Wilson bill. Here, again, it is proposed to legislate in the interest of the stock-raiser of Canada, Central America, Mexico, and other foreign countries, and against that of the American stock-raiser. Under the McKinley act there is a specific duty of $30 per head on horses valued at less than $150, and 30 per cent ad valorem on all valued at $150 or over. The pending measure fixes the duty on all horses imported at the low rate of 20 per cent ad valorem.

Now, what must be the inevitable effect of this change on the American horse-raiser? During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, we imported into this country 12,248 horses valued at less than $150 each, and 382 valued at $150 and over; in all 12,630 head of the total value of $1,164,483.50, and on which we collected duty to the amount of $367,440. Now, during the three years—1887–1889 inclusive—immediately preceding the enactment of the McKinley law, when the duty was but 20 per cent——

Mr. GRAY. What was the duty prior to the McKinley law?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Twenty per cent.

Mr. GRAY. The same that is in the Wilson bill?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Just the same. We imported horses of the aggregate value for these three years of $7,308,437, or of the average annual value of $2,436,145; while for the three years—1891–1893 inclusive—immediately after the enactment of the McKinley law, the average annual value of our importations was but $1,189,621, or less annually than for the three preceding years by $1,246,524.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Oregon a question?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. Is it not a fact that in the two years last past, the price of horses in this country has been lower than for very many years preceding?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly, and the price of everything has been lower.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the question whether that is not true?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Doubtless so, and it is also true that the price of everything the farmer has produced has been lower.

Mr. GRAY. Is it not true that under the provisions of the McKinley law the price of horses has been very much lower to the stock-raiser and to the farmer who had them to sell than it was prior to the enactment of that law with a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem upon them?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I say no, when you take into consideration the prices of American products generally.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Delaware contend that that decrease in price arises from the increase in duty?

Mr. GRAY. I only ask the question. It would be a very interesting inquiry (not, however, to be injected into the speech of the Senator from Oregon, of course) as to what was the cause and effect and the mere sequence of those two rates of duty.

Mr. ALDRICH. The natural inference from the Senator's question was that the price had gone down on account of the increase of duty.

Mr. GRAY. I am quite willing to go into that question with the Senator from Rhode Island if the Senator from Oregon will permit me.

Mr. ALDRICH. I imagine, before the discussion is finished, we shall have plenty of opportunity for a discussion of that kind.

Mr. QUAY. I have always understood that one of the causes of the decline in the price of horses was the substitution of the electric and cable system on street passenger railways, which practically cuts off all demand for horses in that direction.

Mr. GRAY. I have no doubt that has had an influence.

Mr. QUAY. It has been a very important factor.

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me a single remark, I do not think anyone will say that the price of horses has been reduced by the McKinley law, but I think it does demonstrate the folly of attempting to keep up the price of horses by protection. Horses in Illinois are, to my personal knowledge, lower to-day than they have been for forty years.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PALMER. With great pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think the duty has had any effect on the price of horses one way or the other?

Mr. PALMER. I do not.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does he think that protective duties usually have any effect on the price of articles?

Mr. PALMER. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why are horses an exception?

Mr. PALMER. I speak of the infinite folly, and I may say the unfairness of the promises made by protectionists.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator in his own time and his own way will give the Senate and the country a chance to know what rule it is that applies to these questions.

Mr. GRAY. Without wishing to trespass on the great amiability of the Senator from Oregon, I desire to say (and perhaps I may have a chance to develop the thought) that the contention on our side has been that a tariff on any of the products of agriculture, on all those things that are peculiarly the property of the farmers of the country, can not be affected advantageously in price to the farmer by the McKinley tariff law, and that all such tariff matter in the McKinley law has been thrown as a sop to the farmers, with the hope, I suppose, that they were ignorant enough to believe they were getting some protection, when in fact they got none.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Delaware contend that that rule applies to sugar and to rice, or is this a sectional question? Are there some parts of the country where a protective duty protects and other parts where it does not protect?

Mr. GRAY. We contend that a tariff tax on horses, like a tariff tax on wheat and corn, is an illusion and a snare to the farmer, and was known to be such by those who put it in the McKinley law.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Delaware answer me a question? Why does the Democratic party put an ad valorem duty of 86 per cent on rice? What is the purpose of placing that duty on rice in the pending bill?

Mr. GRAY. I do not know that the Democratic party has done it.

Mr. ALDRICH. And why does the Democratic party increase the duty on barely two or three times in the course of this discussion?

Mr. GRAY. I do not know that the Democratic party has done it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator is advised, why did the committee, which reported this bill, provide for a protective duty of at least 86 and a fraction per cent on rice? What was the purpose?

Mr. GRAY. I am not on the committee, and therefore I can not answer that question.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the Senator from Delaware willing to assert——

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Rhode Island is a member of the committee, and perhaps he can answer it.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will permit me, the only information I have on the subject is from the speech of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], that those rates were put in the bill to get votes to pass it.

Mr. GRAY. That may be.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know whether the Senator from Delaware confirms that statement.

Mr. GRAY. When you come to take down an artificial edifice like a protective tariff, founded in avarice, greed, and fraud, it is a very hard and difficult task; indeed I have found out by what I have heard from the committee, of which the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island is a member, that various devices have been resorted to to placate the avarice and persistence and intensity of the protected classes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from Delaware will join with me when the discussion is concluded and a vote is reached in removing those excrescences from the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Delaware is hardly fair. He injects into the belly of my speech an assumption which I for one certainly am not willing to admit, and that is, that the protective policy is founded in avarice, greed, and fraud. This is a severe, and, as I think, unwarranted characterization. The very question we are here to reason and argue out is as to whether the protective policy which has been characterized by those harsh terms is the kind of policy he insists it is, and also whether the pending bill is or is not an American institution, or whether it is not rather in all its features an un-American proposition to legislate against the real interests of the people of this country and in the interest of foreigners.

Mr. GRAY. I think it is more American than the McKinley law, but not as American as it ought to be.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not think it is American at all. There is nothing American about it. It is un-American from beginning to end, as I have been endeavoring to show.

I will now proceed with the duty on horses. I have shown that whatever effect it may have had on the price, the importation of horses for the three years to this country from Canada perhaps more than quadrupled since the passage of that bill. This shows clearly the effect of the protective policy. The fact that even under the existing law our importations have reached in the last year 12,630 head, of the value of $164,483.50, shows conclusively how eager are the Canadians to invade our markets, and also the ability they have to do it, even under existing conditions and restrictions.

Mr. DOLPH. Will my colleague allow me to make a single suggestion in this connection about the importation of horses from Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. The falling off of importations in 1891 and the invoice price in Canada have been used as an argument to show that high protection did not increase the price of animals in the United States or that it did not materially decrease the price in Canada. The importations of horses in 1890 to the United States from Canada were 16,170 head. The invoice value per head was $97.29, and the duty then was 20 per cent ad valorem. In 1891, under the McKinley law, the importations were 11,077, and the invoice price per head $102.75, the duty being $30 per head In the report from which I read it is stated:

The value of horses in Canada has advanced $5.46 per head under an increase of duty of 50 per cent.

The only answer to that is to say that with 20 per cent ad valorem we got a larger number of animals, but we got cheaper animals. You can not afford to import a cheap horse when you have to pay a duty of $30 on it. Therefore, we get much better horses under the McKinley law when we pay $30 duty, and the prices paid in Canada were much larger. That is a full explanation of that suggestion.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is true.

Now, reduce the duty one-third, as is proposed by this bill, and what may we not expect in the way of importations and competition with the American stock-raiser, in so far as horses are concerned? This country is amply able to produce all the horses we need, and even for export.

There were in the United States in 1890, according to the census, 14,213,837 head of horses of the value of $978,516,562, while according to the latest Statistical Abstract there were on the 1st of January last (1894) in this country 16,081,201 head, or an increase in the number in the past three years of 1,877,364 head—an increase over the number of head in 1880 of 5,723,713 head, as the total number in 1880 was but 10,357,488. The State of Oregon alone has 235,607 head of horses of the value of $6,947,718, while the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, Washington, and Idaho, and the Territory of Arizona, all horse-breeding territory, have 1,200,497 head of horses of the value of $45,958,682.

We can under a proper protective policy not only supply our own demand for horses, but become exporters to many millions of dollars' worth annually. Indeed, we are now exporters to a considerable amount, as during the last three years we have exported 9,303 head of horses of the value of $2,114,703, as against 7,622 head of the value of $1,856,850 exported for the three years, 1887-1889, preceding the enactment of the McKinley law.

CATTLE.

But what is true of horses is also true respecting cattle. This great agricultural industry is also assailed by the Wilson bill in the same ruthless and, it would seem, senseless manner. Under the existing law there is a specific duty of $2 per head on all cattle 1 year old or less, and $10 per head on all more than 1 year old, which is equivalent to 43.53 per cent on the former and 63.22 per cent on the latter. The pending Wilson bill proposes to change all this to 20 per cent ad valorem on all cattle of whatever age, or, in other words, to reduce the tariff to about one-third the present rate. Now, what has been the effect in its advantages to the American cattle-raiser by the McKinley act and the protective policy, and what will probably be the effect of this proposed change in this policy?

We imported for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, 2,272 head of cattle of less than 1 year old, of the value of $10,438, and 826 head of 1 year old or more, of the value of $13,065, or a total number of head of 3,098, of the value of $23,503; and the total number of head of cattle imported during the three years—1891-1893, inclusive—since the passage of the McKinley act was but 9,652 head in 1891, 2,036 head in 1892, and 3,098 head in 1893, aggregating for the three years but 14,786 head, of the aggregate value of but $97,524, or an annual average importation for these three years under the McKinley act of but 4,928 head, of the average annual value of $32,512; whereas for the three years preceding the enactment of the McKinley act—1887-1889—when the duty was substantially as now proposed, we imported 187,721 head, as follows:

In 1887, 72,665 head; in 1888, 57,505 head; and in 1889, 57,551 head, or an average for three years of 62,573 head, of the aggregate value of $2,200,486, or an annual average in value of $733,495.33.

Why, then, should we go back to the old policy, which will bring into competition with the cattle-raisers of this country from sixty to one hundred thousand head of Canadian and other foreign cattle annually and drain our country annually of over a million dollars, which will go into the pockets of foreign cattle-raisers?

The cattle industry of the United States is an immense one. It is an agricultural interest moreover. Our country should, and can under a proper protective policy, export largely of cattle instead of importing. In fact we are to-day exporters of cattle to many millions of dollars in value annually. In 1890 we exported cattle to the value of $31,261,131; in 1891 to the value of $30,445,249, and in 1892 to the value of $35,099,095, or an aggregate of $96,805,475, as against $37,366,631 during the three years—1887-1889—immediately preceding the passage of the McKinley act.

The dairy interest is mightily involved in this question. In 1890 we had in this country, according to the census, 15,952,883 milch cows of the value of $352,152,133 and 36,849,024 head of oxen and other cattle of the enormous value of $560,625,137, while according to the latest statistical reports, there were in this country on January 1, 1894, 16,482,400 head of milch cows of the value of $359,978,670 and 36,608,168 head of oxen and other cattle of the value of $536,789,747. The State of Oregon alone has 110,398 milch cows or one cow for every three persons in the State, of the value of $2,356,997, while California, Oregon, Nevada, Washington, Idaho, and Arizona have 611,587 milch cows of the value of $15,425,847 and oxen and other cattle 3,476,941 head, of the value of $51,532,510. In the face of these figures, why do we wish to open the doors to the importation of milch cows, oxen, and other cattle from foreign countries?

EGGS.

Eggs were on the free list until the passage of the McKinley act, and what was the result? There were imported into this country from 1884 to 1890 inclusive, a period of seven years, 109,238,757 dozen of eggs of the value of $1,950,616, or an annual average of 15,605,536 dozen. Under the operation of the McKinley law, which imposes a duty of 5 cents per dozen on imported eggs, our importations for the year 1893 fell off to 3,295,842 dozen, or to only a fraction over one-fifth of the annual importations before that act came into force. This Wilson bill puts eggs back on the free list.

FLAX AND HEMP.

The cultivation also of flax and hemp in this country, along with all other agricultural products, gets a black eye from Schedule J of the pending bill. Under existing law this industry receives encouragement to the extent of $5 per ton, equal to 18.68 per cent ad valorem on the straw, $22.40 per ton in hackled or dressed, equal to 10.77 per cent ad valorem; on tow, $11.20 per ton, equal to 7.40 per cent. Tow of hemp, $11.20 per ton, equal to 9.16 per cent. Hemp $25 per ton, or equal to 17.45 per cent. Binding twine manufactured in whole or in part of istle or Tampico fiber, manilla, sisal grass, or sunn, seven-tenths of a cent per pound, or 6.47 per cent ad valorem. The pending bill places all these products on the free list.

FLAX AND HEMP MANUFACTURES.

The flax, hemp, and jute manufacturing industry fall under the ban of the pending bill. Encouragement should be given to this industry in this country, and is given by the McKinley act. That act places 2½ cents per pound on cables and cordage of hemp untarred. As a result we imported during the fiscal year, June 30, 1893, but 31,290 pounds, of the value of but $3,501. Other untarred, composed in whole or in part of istle or Tampico fiber, manilla, sisal grass, or sunn, 1½ cents per pound.

As a result we imported but 145,162 pounds during the fiscal year, of the value of $12,914, while the duty on tarred under the McKinley act is 3 cents per pound and on all other 1½ cents per pound. These specific rates are equal to 22.34 per cent on cables and cordage of hemp untarred and 16.86 per cent, 31.23 per cent, 18.78 per cent, and 15.83 per cent on the other four varieties named, while the pending bill in both Senate and House places an ad valorem duty on all these several varieties of but 10 per cent, or an average of about one-half the existing duty.

The cordage and binder-twine industry of the Pacific coast is a new one there, not in any manner connected, as I understand, with any great combine, and the pending Wilson bill will be virtually its deathblow. As bearing upon this subject, I submit the following communication from the Portland Cordage Company, Portland, Oregon:

[The Portland Cordage Company, manufacturers of cordage and binder twine.]

PORTLAND, OREGON, January 22, 1894.

DEAR SIRS: Inclosed you will find, signed by 31 of our employés, and addressed to the United States Senate, a protest against those clauses of the Wilson bill that relate to manila and sisal rope, and binder twine. Please see that this protest is put in the way of doing all the good possible towards accomplishing the object prayed for.

It is of vital importance to us, and indirectly to this whole community, that the tariff on rope and twine be not reduced from its present schedule.

Free trade in these articles, or an approach to it, will put us in direct competition with the rope manufacturers in Hongkong, where labor is but a fractional part of what it is here (being from 10 cents to 25 cents per day). In addition to that, the freight on rops from the East Indies will probably be very low, as a large proportion of our yearly grain fleet comes here in ballast from those climes (from Europe via East Indies with general cargoes for those ports), and they can and probably will accept very low rates from the East Indies to the United States and save the handling of ballast.

We think our strongest competition in cordage will come from China. If so, the labor that we would pay here, under protection, with free trade will be transferred to China.

This west coast will be helpless without a protective tariff, because our volume of trade is so very limited (to say nothing of higher expenses) that our cost of manufacture must necessarily be at the maximum until there is a more plentiful supply of labor and increased consumption by increase of immigration.

Our European competition, under free trade, would come mostly from England and there we must contend against interest, insurance, and labor probably 50 per cent less than the average in the United States, but there is another item that we think is not given due consideration, and that is the marine transportation from the Philippine Islands and Yucatan to the factories and thence to the general markets of the world. England for the past century has fostered her marine until now she has a direct line of sailing vessels to all the good markets of the world. This we, the American people, do not enjoy, and regular and cheap transportation to the world's markets would be the life of any business. As it is we are shut out of a large portion of the world's markets and the proposed tariff's advocates ask us to be content with only a portion of our home market. If we could manufacture as cheaply to-day as the English we would be still shut out on account of transportation.

In years past at this season, we have run our factory at full capacity and manufactured a large stock of binder twine and rope for the following summer's trade, but the uncertainty about the tariff now compels us to move cautiously, so we have made a reduction of 25 per cent in our pay roll schedule, and are only employing thirty-one hands, whereas a year ago we gave work to sixty-five mill hands. If free trade comes we want a small stock on hand at a reduced cost, because it is likely to prove more profitable to close the factory and loan the working capital.

We know that you are interested in the general cause of protection, but beg of you to give a little especial attention towards having the tariff on cordage and twine maintained as at present.

Thanking you and your honorable colleagues in advance, we remain,

Yours respectfully,

THE PORTLAND CORDAGE COMPANY,
By S. M. MEARS, Treasurer.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH and Hon. JOHN H. MITCHELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The petition of employés referred to in the foregoing letter is as follows:

PORTLAND, OREGON, January 16, 1894.

To the United States Senate;

HONORED SIRS: We, the undersigned wage earners, employé in the manufacture of rope and binder twine, at Portland, Oregon, respectfully wish to protest against the proposed reduction of the tariff on manila and sisal rope from 1½ cents per pound to 10 per cent ad valorem, and also against the removal of the entire duty from binder twine.

Capital is independent, and if profits are not satisfactory under the proposed tariff, the first thing that rope manufacturers will do—as many have already done, in anticipation of the change—will be to reduce our wages, which will be but a natural result, as they must meet the competition of foreign cordage manufacturers who pay fully 50 per cent less wages than are paid here, and who use improved machinery, equal to that in use in the factories of this country. We know this, many of us having worked in foreign factories. Reduction to foreign rate of wages means foreign manner of living which will be harder for some of us now than if we had not risen from it under the benefit of protection, and still harder for those who have always worked under the advantage of protected wages.

If profits do not prove satisfactory with reduced wages, capital will then be withdrawn from rope manufacturing to a large extent, and many of us will be forced out of our present employment into other lines of labor already over-supplied.

We know that manufacturers in this country, in competing with those of Europe, have to contend against the very low rate of interest and insurance and low wages that their competitors enjoy, and on this west coast they have a very limited market for their products, which means maximum cost.

We think the conditions demand a protective tariff to equalize these differences and make the rope manufacturing business profitable to our employers as well as to the employés.

Praying for your wise and generous action in preventing the passage of that portion of the Wilson bill referred to, we are, honored sirs,

Yours respectfully.

Mr. DOLPH. That is the petition the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] prevented me from reading in the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is. It goes into the RECORD now as a part of my remarks, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Missouri and the Senate to it.

VEGETABLES, DAIRY PRODUCTS, FRUITS, FISH.

In the whole list of agricultural products not one seems to have escaped the blighting influence of the Wilson bill. The producers of all kinds of vegetable and dairy products are made to suffer. The duty on potatoes is reduced from 25 cents per bushel, equal to 51.96 per cent, to 30 per cent ad valorem; onions from 40 cents per bushel, equal to 51.48 per cent, to 20 per cent ad valorem, a reduction of over three-fifths; beans from 40 cents per bushel, equal to 40.63 per cent, to 20 per cent ad valorem; butter and substitutes therefor from 6 cents per pound, equal to 32.88 per cent, to 20 per cent ad valorem; cheese from 6 cents per pound, equal to 42.96, to 25 per cent; milk, including weight of package, from 3 cents per pound, equal to 33.92 per cent, to 2 cents per pound, equal to 22.62 per cent.

In addition to these large reductions on vegetables and dairy products, fresh milk, with a present duty of 5 cents per gallon; broom corn $8 per ton; cabbages 3 cents each; cider 5 cents per gallon; eggs 5 cents per dozen; pease, green, in bulk or packages, 40 cents per bushel; plants, trees, shrubs, and vines, 20 per cent ad valorem; garden seeds, agricultural and other seeds, 20 per cent ad valorem; straw 30 per cent; bacon and hams, 5 cents per pound, equal to 22.06 per cent ad valorem; meats, dressed or undressed, 10 per cent; lard 2 cents per pound; tallow, 1 cent per pound; grease of wool, known as "degras," one-half of 1 cent per pound; and salt in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages, 12 cents per 100 pounds, and in bulk 8 cents per 100 pounds, are all transferred to the free list by the pending bill.

The producer of all kinds of fruits, in addition to those to which I have already attracted attention, are dealt severely with by the pending bill.

The duty on apples, green and ripe, is reduced from 25 cents per bushel—equal to 33.93 per cent—to 20 per cent ad valorem. In the bill as it passed the House apples were on the free list. On apples dried, desiccated, evaporated, from 2 cents per pound—equal to 42.41 per cent—to 20 per cent ad valorem. They were on the free list in the House bill. On fruits preserved in their own juices—an immense industry on the Pacific coast—the duty is reduced from 30 per cent ad valorem to 20 per cent. The fishing industry receives a severe shock from this bill.

By its provisions millions of dollars are thrown to the fishermen of Canada. The duty on pickled and canned fish, all varieties, as this bill came from the House, is reduced from one-fourth to one-third all along the line, from the anchovies and sardines to salmon. The duty on salted salmon was by the House bill reduced from 1 cent per pound—and under which 908,113 pounds, of the value of $63,722, were imported last year—to three-fourths of a cent per pound—or equal to 10.69 per cent. The Senate committee, however, have changed this to 15 per cent ad valorem. But the duty on salmon in cans or packages made of tin is reduced from 30 per cent ad valorem to 25 per cent. But when we come to fresh fish, salmon and every other variety, every barrier is thrown down, every port is thrown open, all are placed on the free list.

Under existing law there is a specific duty of one-fourth of a cent per pound on all fresh herring and three-fourths of a cent per pound on all fresh salmon, and on all other varieties a like duty. But with this restriction we imported last year 1,238,605 pounds of fresh salmon, of the value of $116,124; 383,619 pounds of fresh herring, of the value of $4,937, and 9,999,522 pounds of all other varieties of fresh fish, of the value of $408,717.81. But I have not the time nor has the Senate to hear me, to point out all the enormities of the pending bill, and hence I will rely on the well-known maxim "Ab uno disce omnes.

Why should we interfere with the producers of dairy products in this country when the statistics disclose the important fact that we exported during the eight months ending February 28, of the fiscal year 1893, dairy products to the value of $7,255,781; or with seeds when during the same period we exported seeds to the value of $3,222,344; or vegetables when we exported during the same period vegetables to the value of $1,484,475; or hops when we exported during the same period hops to the value of $2,123,061; or wood and manufactures of wood when during the same period we were exporters to the value of $16,385,510? Legislation of this character against our products, our own interests, the interests of the wage-workers as well as capitalists is simply inexcusable, not to say unpardonable, if not indeed criminal, from any possible point of view.

A careful inspection of the pending bill discloses the remarkable fact that out of $50,000,000 of duties which this bill puts upon the free list, thirty-five million are taken from the duties on agricultural products. Yet our Democratic friends and the present Administration are professedly the friends of the farmer!

LUMBER.

The lumber interest of this country is another important industry attacked by the pending bill. Under the McKinley act wood and the manufactures of wood were given protection to the following extent:

Timber:
Used for spars and in building wharves	cubic foot	10 per cent.
Hewn and sawed	cubic foot	Do.
Squared or sided, not specially provided for	cubic foot	½ cent per cu. ft.
Lumber:
Boards, planks, deals, and other sawed lumber—
Of hemlock, white wood, sycamore, white pine, and bass wood—
Not planed or finished	M feet	$1 per M feet.
All sawed lumber, not specially provided for—
Not planed or finished	M feet	$2 per M feet.
Paving posts, railroad ties, and telephone and telegraph poles of cedar	No.	20 per cent.
Sawed boards, planks, deals, and all forms of sawed cedar, lignum vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogony, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods not further manufactured than sawed	M feet	15 per cent.
Unmanufactured, not specially provided for		20 per cent.
Veneers of wood		Do.
Clapboards—
Pine	M	$1 per M.
Spruce	M	$1.50 per M.
Hubs for wheels, posts, last, wagon, oar, gun, and heading blocks, and all like blocks or sticks, rough hewn or sawed only		20 per cent.
Laths	M	15 cents per M.
Pickets and palings	M	10 per cent.
Shingles—
White pine	M	20 cents per M.
All other	M	30 cents per M.
Staves of all kinds		10 per cent.

The pending bill removes every one of these duties and places each and all of the foregoing items of wood and the manufactures of wood on the free list.

This is another legislative tribute to our Canadian neighbors on the north. This is legislation in direct opposition to one of the great industries of this country—a deadly blow at American capital, American lumbermen, and the large number of laborers who earn their daily bread as wage-workers in this business.

It is not perhaps generally known that the lumber trade of the United States represents a larger investment of money and gives employment to a greater number of persons than any other single industry in the United States, while on the Pacific coast the ratio of both investment and employés, as stated by one of the petitions from that section presented to the Senate and now before the Committee on Finance, as applied to the volume of business, is far beyond that of other sections.

"No other industry not its outgrowth," says this petition, "except coal (which is likewise menaced by the proposed tariff changes), exists in the new Northwest in all that area west of the Cascade Mountains; it increases the taxable wealth, gives employment to hundreds of thousands in mills, in woods, and on land and sea; its commerce and the trade stimulated to supply the mechanical wants of its plants and the physical requirements of the myriads depending upon it for a livelihood, has made populous, magnificent cities on the shores of Puget Sound, and it is incredible that its destruction can be considered, when such destruction will be the inevitable result of the abrogation of the existing tariff as to that industry."

More than $50,000,000 are invested in the lumber industry on the Pacific coast alone. The output last year in the States of Washington, Oregon, and California from over 1,200 sawmills and shingle mills in those States was 2,300,000,000 feet of lumber, and 2,200,000,000 shingles, aggregating in value over $27,000,000. This industry alone gives employment in these three States to over 27,000 persons, to whom are paid annually wages amounting to $18,000,000; and yet the pending bill proposes to open wide the door to the lumbermen of British Columbia and invite them to bring their products into competition with those of the American lumbermen on that coast.

British Columbia has a greater lumber area than that of the Pacific coast. During the year 1893 the States of Oregon and Washington sold to the people of the State of California over 325,000,000 feet of lumber and 11,000,000 shingles. The employés in the lumber industry of British Columbia are principally Chinese and Kanakas, and lumber and shingles in that territory are produced at greatly reduced rates compared with the cost of production in the United States.

The different policies of the United States and Canada in their treatment respectively of the public lands and the public timber is another matter resulting largely in favor of the Canadian lumber producer.

Lumbermen in the United States are not permitted to go on the public lands, while in Canada they are rented out at a mere nominal figure per acre, with the right to cut timber and manufacture lumber. No large amount of capital therefore is required there as in the United States for investment in stumpage.

FREE LUMBER DOES NOT CHEAPEN IT TO THE CONSUMER—THE RETAILER REAPS THE BENEFIT.

Nor is it true that this competition in lumber from British Columbia in the West, or from Eastern Canada in the East, will result in any material benefit to the consumer. The consumer realizes no benefit in the reduction of the price of lumber. Whatever benefit comes from such reduction inures to the retail dealer, and not to the consumer. The wholesale price of lumber on the Pacific coast has been the past year or two remarkably low. The manufacturers of lumber have scarcely been able to keep their mills going by reason of the small profits, and yet lumber to the consumer is as high as ever, clearly showing that it is the men engaged in the business of retail dealers and not the consumers who realize the benefit of low prices. As bearing upon this subject, I desire to insert in my remarks the following letter from Mr. Francis Rotch, a prominent manufacturer of lumber at Bucoda, in the State of Washington:

FROM FRANCIS ROTCH, OF BUCODA.

BUCODA, WASH., December 8, 1893.

Editor West Coast Lumberman:

Replying to your inquiry as to my views on the Wilson tariff bill, I would say that it would take all the columns of your valuable journal, were I to give vent to the anger and indignation with which this most iniquitous measure inspires me. For three years the lumber manufacturers of this coast have been struggling with low prices, overproduction, and contracted markets, forcing many to the wall, and just so much reducing the taxable wealth of this and other States. But the last straw is this bill which seeks to further curtail our markets, opens California to the cheap lumber of British America, produced from cheap stumpage by cheap labor, and carried by cheap foreign vessels.

Our cargo mills, with this territory divided, are forced to look to the Eastern States, thereby coming into competition with the interior mills which have no other outlet. This Eastern trade is further flooded by the Lake Superior and the Georgian Bay white pine carried across the lakes, and taking the place of just so much American product. And who gets the benefit of this fatherly measure? Is it the consumer, the farmer whom the politicians love? Not much. It is the retail dealer who even during the fall in prices which the wholesaler and manufacturer have been forced to make to move an overstock, has not dropped one cent from the figure which he sold at three years ago, when living prices for lumber were obtained. Any traveling man who comes in direct contact with the retailer will bear me out in this statement. It is incomprehensible how any Democrat worthy of the name of man, a reasoning and ostensibly sensible animal, can be carried away by party claptrap or specious reasoning in the face of such cold facts. In a nutshell, the chief industry of many States will be crippled for the benefit of a few retailers.

Yours truly,

FRANCIS ROTCH.

As further bearing upon this subject, I submit the following letter from Mr. R. C. Crosby, a large dealer in lumber and shingles, Portland, Oregon:

To the honorable the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned, your petitioners, being engaged in one or more branches of the manufacture and sale of lumber in the State of Oregon, would respectfully represent to your honorable body the grave apprehension cherished by all persons engaged in such trade and manufacture in view of the reported intention of the majority of your honorable body to place lumber on the free list. Your petitioners would respectfully represent that the lumber trade of the United States represents a larger investment and affords labor to a greater number of employés than any other single industry, while on the Pacific coast the ratio of both investment and employés as applied to volume of business is far beyond that of other sections in the Pacific Northwest.

Your petitioners would further represent that they are brought into close competition with the lumbermen of British Columbia, and they respectfully invite the attention of your honorable body to the great disadvantage under which such competition would place them, in the event of the removal of the present duty on the different products of lumber. The lumber mills and plants of various kinds in British Columbia employ chiefly Chinese labor, and, as is well known, Americans on the Pacific coast will not and can not work for wages which are perfectly satisfactory to the Chinamen.

Your petitioners would further invite the attention of your honorable body to the policy of the Dominion of Canada in subsidizing railroads and steamship lines, and in affording to industrial enterprises concessions in the way of land, etc., and especially to their policy of renting to mills timber lands at a nominal sum per acre per annum, thus relieving the Canadian purchaser of lumber of the necessity of investing large sums of money in stumpage, and relieving him also from the necessity of sharing in the burdens of taxation in proportion to the amount of money so invested in stumpage.

If any further argument could be presented to your honorable body on this subject it would arise out of the present depression in business. At any time the unrestrained competition of Oregon lumbermen with those of British Columbia would be viewed with the gravest apprehension: but in the present depression of business, a depression peculiarly felt in this part of the United States, such a course on the part of your honorable body must necessarily reduce lumber firms and houses to the verge of bankruptcy.

Wherefore your petitioners most respectfully pray that a bill now pending in your honorable body, and known as the Wilson bill, may be amended as to its lumber schedule, and that adequate protection may be given to the lumber interests of the Pacific Northwest.

Respectfully submitted.

R. C. CROSBY.

THE COAL INDUSTRY.

Free coal as proposed by this bill as it passed the House, and a reduction of duty from 75 cents to 40 cents a ton as proposed by a majority of the Senate Committee on Finance, which is no protection, means joy and gladness and prosperity to the coal producers, the mine owners, the coal heavers, and others dependent on the coal industry of Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Australia, and other foreign countries, but brings no word of comfort to any American in any manner connected with that industry. And while it does not mean reduced rates to the consumer, except, perhaps, at seaboard points, and then only for such brief period as such a policy will be necessary to crush out the home industry, it means a reduction of wages to our home miners, a reduction of profit to the home mine owner, a withdrawal of capital already invested in that industry, and a menace to capital generally in connection with this important home industry.

Nova Scotia coal, we are told through reliable statistics, can be delivered on board vessels on the coast of that country at the low figure of $1.11 per ton. According to the consular reports the average cost of transporting coal from Nova Scotia to Boston and other New England ports for the past five years has been $1.90 per ton. But it is said, and truly said, these rates were abnormally large, owing to the small amount of coal imported under the existing tariff rates. But it is a fact that the Dominion Coal Company (limited), of Canada, of which Henry M. Whitney is president, with its remarkably increased shipping facilities, can transport coal from Louisburg, Nova Scotia, to Boston and other New England ports for considerably less than $1 per ton.

The recent report of Mr. J. S. McLellan, treasurer of that company, of date February 15, 1894, shows the remarkable fact that on an output of 834,019 tons of coal, costing $958,336.73, there was a gross profit to the company of $231,162.71, and an additional profit on steamship, barges and railways in connection with their mines of $103,267.95, or a total of $334,430.66; and from which a deduction for expenses, profit and loss, etc., of $87,721.22 is claimed, leaving net profits of $246,709.44, less $90,000, applied to interest on bonds of the company, to distribute as dividends on preferred stock, $120,000, to apply to sinking fund $14,731.96, and to credit of profit and loss $21,977.48; this all within a period of ten months, as the company was only organized February 16, 1893, while this report was up to date December 31, 1893.

Similar conditions exist in British Columbia which under free coal or reduced duty as proposed in the pending bill menaces the rapidly developing extensive coal fields of Washington and Oregon. Coal can be placed on shipboard in Nainimo and Bellingham Bay very much cheaper than from the coal fields of Washington and Oregon. In 1880 there were produced in the Pacific States and Territories—Oregon, Washington, and Utah—but 422,170 tons, whereas the output in 1892 was 1,512,748 tons, or nearly a quadruple increase in a period of twelve years. The one county of King, in the State of Washington, the county in which the city of Seattle is located, produced last year over 470,000 tons.

Of the 44 States composing this Union, 30 of them and 3 Territories—Utah, Indian, and New Mexico—are coal producing territory. Of these 19 are Northern States and 11 Southern States, counting Maryland as a Southern State. These 30 States and 3 Territories produced in 1892 160,188,474 tons of coal, 46,908,452 tons of which were anthracite and 113,280,022 bituminous. And of this amount the 11 Southern States produced 27,154,438 tons, while the 19 Northern States produced 133,034,036 tons and the 3 Territories—Utah, New Mexico, and Indian Territory—1,975,859 tons. From this it will be seen that a little less than 17 per cent of our coal production came from the South, while a fraction over 83 per cent is produced in the North.

The total production of coal in Great Britain in 1892 was some 4,000,000 tons less than were produced in the United States. The total production in Great Britain was 186,130,909 tons, of which 150,949,279 tons were mined in England and Wales, 26,074,949 tons in Scotland, and 105,681 tons in Ireland.

In the light of the great development of the coal industry in his own State of West Virginia under the operation of a protective tariff of 75 cents per ton, how can the distinguished author of the pending bill, or his colleagues on this floor, favor a reduction of duty to 40 cents a ton, which will unquestionably result in bringing into direct competition with that industry the cheaply mined coals of Nova Scotia and other foreign countries. Do he and they forget that under the existing tariff the production of coal in that State has increased from 3,360,000 tons in 1884 to 9,738,755 tons in 1892? Do they fail to remember that the number of persons to whom this industry gave employment in that State was increased from 4,497 in 1880 to 14,867 in 1892, and that the amount of wages paid these employés was increased from $1,298,316 in 1889 to $3,537,107 in 1892, and that the $5,750,674 capital invested in that industry in West Virginia in 1880 was increased in the short period of nine years, in 1889, to $10,508,50?

Can Maryland's representatives on this floor vote to reduce within a fraction of one-half the existing duties on coal, thus closing their eyes and their ears to the history of that magnificent development and expansion of that great industry in the State they represent? Can they forget that the production of coal in Maryland was increased from 2,899,572 tons in 1890 to 3,419,962 two years later, in 1892, or an increase in the output in that short period under existing tariff laws of 520,390 tons, and the investments of capital in which have been increased from $13,165,557 in 1880 to $18,025,367 in 1889, and the amount of wages paid employés from $1,370,079 in 1880 to $1,700,305 in 1889?

Can our friends from the great mineral State of Alabama vote to change an economic policy in reference to a great industry of their State under whose beneficent influence the output of coal in that State has been increased in six years from 1,800,000 tons in 1886 to the enormous tonnage of 5,529,312 in 1892; an industry which in 1880 gave employment to but 1,513 persons, but which in 1892, twelve years later, employed 10,075 persons; an industry in which in 1880 there were invested in that State capital to the amount only of $772,858, but which nine years later, in 1889, had invested therein the enormous sum of $12,535,194?

We imported into this country in 1892, 1,143,304 tons of bituminous coal and shale, on all of which a duty of 75 cents a ton was paid. Surrounded, then, as we are by prolific foreign coal fields, operated by Chinamen and other like cheap labor, in Australia, British Columbia, and Nova Scotia, what amount will not be imported with a reduction of one-half in the duty on foreign coal? And these excessive importations mean, especially on the Pacific coast, the closing of our mines, thousands of miners thrown out of employment, and a little later on an increase in the price of coal to the consumer, under a monopoly held by the coal producers of British Columbia.

LEAD.

The Wilson bill as it passed the House of Representatives was the final blow in the destruction of the silver-mining interests of this country, in so far as that destruction was not already complete by legislation heretofore had in that direction, by reducing the duty on lead contained in silver ore from 1½ cents per pound, the rate under existing law, equal to 75.36 per cent, to 15 per cent ad valorem, or a reduction to one-fifth of the present rate, and by reducing the duty on lead contained in other ore and dross from 1½ cents per pound, the existing duty, equal to 28.20 per cent, to 15 per cent ad valorem, a reduction of nearly half, and by reducing the duty on pigs and bars, molten and old refuse lead run into blocks and bars, and scrap lead from 2 cents per pound, the rate under existing law, equal to 49.13 per cent. to 1 cent, per pound, equal to 24.56 per cent, just one-half. A slight improvement on these rates, it is true, has been made by the Senate committee, changing the duty on lead contained in silver ore from 15 per cent ad valorem, as fixed by the House, to three-fourths of 1 cent per pound, equal to 37.68 per cent This is the only change.

We imported during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, notwithstanding the existing duty of 1½ cents per pound, lead in silver ore to the amount of 59,809,044 pounds of the value of $1,190,462.21, and lead contained in other ore and dross 3,327 pounds of the value of $177, and of pigs and bars, molten and old refuse lead run into blocks and bars, and old scrap lead, fit only to be manufactured, 3,975,521 pounds of the value of $161,833. With these large importations coming into competition with the lead produced in this country, notwithstanding the existing duties, what may we not expect in the way of importations under the largely reduced duties provided for in the pending bill?

I shall not detain the Senate in discussing at length this question of protection to lead in all its bearings. This will be done more intelligently, I doubt not, when the schedule is reached, by our colleagues from Idaho, Montana, and other silver and lead producing States. It has already been fully and ably discussed in the House of Representatives by the able Representative from the State of Idaho [Mr. SWEET], and to his speech on that subject delivered in the House of Representatives January 27, 1894, I take great pleasure in attracting especial attention.

HEAR WHAT CERTAIN LEADING INFLUENTIAL DEMOCRATIC JOURNALS HAVE TO SAY RESPECTING THE WILSON TARIFF MEASURE.

The Cincinnati Enquirer (Democratic) of February 1, says:

The Democratic platform [of 1892] is not notice that the benefits of protection, which has entwined itself through our whole business fabric, must be suddenly eliminated, but the Wilson bill is, except in those abnormal and unaccountable sections in which it out-McKinleys McKinley in McKinleyism.

I suppose this has reference to rice and sugar.

Mr. GRAY. That is the precedent of McKinleyism in it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The article continues:

The Democratic platform does not mean to give the ultra free traders full sweep for their eccentricities, but the Wilson bill does. The Democratic platform does not countenance a deficiency in the revenues, but the Wilson bill does.

The Wilson bill standing alone is an un-Democratic attack on the industry and prosperity of the country, and a most pernicious measure in the matter of revenue.

I will state to the Senator from Delaware that that is what one of the leading Democratic papers of the country says about the pending bill.

With the income tax attached it will be much worse.

Worse and more of it, you see.

It will be a measure to carry elections with for the Republican candidates.

Halt, Democrats. As we began, so we close. Do not wreck the Democratic party.

Mr. FRYE. That is bad advice. The best thing that could be done would be to wreck that party.

Mr. HOAR. From what paper is the Senator from Oregon reading?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Cincinnati Enquirer, a leading Democratic paper of this country, and it quotes the New York Sun, also Democratic, as saying:

The Wilson bill is a measure in which there is no vestige of Democratic principle. From top to bottom it betrays the Democracy and makes it despicable in the eyes of the people. So far as the treachery of a single branch of Congress and of a Democratic Administration can bring the Democratic party into disgrace, that result will be accomplished if that atrocious bill is passed on Thursday.

The New York Sun article was written before the bill passed the House of Representatives.

In contrast with the free trade tariff for revenue speech of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance in opening this debate, I beg pardon for inserting the following quotation from a speech reported to have been made by that distinguished Senator at the opening of the industrial fair in Atlanta, Ga., October 5, 1881:

SENATOR VOORHEES ONCE A PROTECTIONIST.

The Industrial World, of Chicago, republishes the following extracts from an address delivered by Hon. D. W. VOORHEES, now chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, at the opening of the industrial fair at Atlanta, Ga., on October 5, 1881. Mr. VOORHEES said:

"Freedom of trade has a seductive sound, but, if it be not reciprocal, and of equal advantage among nations, it is attractive only in sound, and nothing more. The policy of a wise government is necessarily one of self-interest, and it has a trust to perform in the care of its own people before carrying out benevolence to others.

"The policy of a free and unrestricted exchange and sale of commodities between commercial countries has, for the last fifty years especially, been the theme of eulogy on the part of British writers and statesmen, but it can not be forgotten that this policy was never advanced on the part of Great Britain until, by hundreds of years of not merely protective but prohibitory legislation, she had so fostered and built up her home industries, and, at the same time, so cheapened the wages of labor, that competition on the part of other nations was no longer feared. The student of history has but a short distance to go in the past in order to find English laws demanding the barbarous penalties of death and mutilation against the importation and exportation of certain agricultural productions. Such absolute exclusiveness in trade as the comparatively recent history of England presents can hardly be found in any other country outside of China."

The objections to the pending bill are summarized and pointedly presented in the following communication to the Congress of the United States by the officers of the American Protective Tariff League of the United States, of date January 26, 1894:

NEW YORK, January 26, 1894.

To the Congress of the United States:

The American Protective Tariff League, representing millions of your fellow-citizens interested in the protection of American labor and American industries, profoundly impressed with the wide-reaching disaster which must come upon the American people should the Wilson bill become a law, enters earnest protest against its passage. Already the threat of its passage has paralyzed industries, deprived hundreds of thousands of work, and caused millions to suffer.

We protest against this bill—

1. Because it will reduce wages and can not correspondingly reduce the cost of what wages must buy;

2. Because it will give employment to foreigners, and to that extent lessen the work of our own people;

3. Because it violently strikes at our protective system, which during thirty years has raised us to a higher average of civilization than the people of any nation upon earth;

4. Because it is folly to suppose we can buy from foreign countries and still give our own people more employment and better wages; and,

5. Because it is time enough to capture the markets of the world when we are assured of our own.

The passage of this bill—

Will increase and make more permanent the evils which have already befallen us;

Will deprive American labor of the means wherewith to maintain the high standard of living; and

Will rob the American producer of so much of the American market as it gives to the foreigner.

These facts are emphasized by smokeless chimneys, fireless forges, silent wheels, and dumb spindles; while starvation and cold, sickness and death, and the uncertainty and hopelessness of a once happy people give the stamp of conviction to our appeal.

Respectfully submitted,

As indicating how the representatives of the farmers of this country regard the Wilson bill in its relation to the farming interests of the United States, I beg to submit the following communication addressed to the Congress by the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry, of date January 30, 1894:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 30, 1894.

To the Senators and Representatives assembled in the Congress of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned, have been appointed a committee of the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry to urge before your honorable body such legislation as is deemed by our order essential to the prosperity of the agricultural interests of our country, and in attempting to discharge this duty we find it necessary to emphatically object to some of the changes proposed in the agricultural schedule by the so-called Wilson tariff bill, and in so doing we have nothing to say for or against protection as a policy of the Government, but as a revenue measure, every American citizen is interested.

We deem it the true policy of the National Government to collect its revenues, as much as possible, from duties on imports, as being a system of taxation more equitable and less burdensome when justly distributed than direct taxation upon the industries and property of our people, thus leaving this class of subjects to the States for taxation for the collection of their revenues, as they can not levy an import tax under the Constitution of the General Government.

Another reason why foreign trade should pay import duties is that our Government must maintain wharves and warehouses for the accommodation of their trade, and this trade should justly pay for this privilege out of which it is proposed to gain a livelihood.

The members of our order, of course, differ in their views upon the details of equitable tariff legislation. It is not the duty of the order to interfere with the free exercise of the rights of our members as citizens.

When the people at the ballot box decide any issue raised by the political parties on general principles our order cheerfully accepts the situation, and only insists that the policy thus indorsed shall be fairly carried into effect without any discrimination against the farmer, or any class or interest in our country.

When the people decided for the protective policy at the polls we asked Congress that in the proposed tariff revision agriculture should receive the same consideration as did other interests. Our demands were respectfully and fully considered, and with one exception all that we asked was incorporated in the tariff laws of our country, and the farmers were largely incidentally protected in the American markets, and as a result realized better prices for hay, barley, vegetables, potatoes, beans, live stock, poultry, eggs, tobacco, fruits, and many other products, which were not oppressive to those engaged in other vocations.

In the change of the political situation of our country our farmers had reason to believe that in the revision of the tariff, placing it on a new basis, that it would be so adjusted that duties would be imposed largely on luxuries and such products as might be imported that would directly come in competition with American agricultural productions and American manufactures, which were essential to give employment to American labor and capital. In fact, this was guaranteed in the Chicago platform of the present party.

The legislative committee of the National Grange, at the special session of Congress advised the Committee of Ways and Means of the importance of taking care of the agricultural interests in drafting a revised tariff bill.

Had the committee reported a bill in strict conformity with the decision of the people at the polls we should have nothing to say against it, but because the proposed legislation is very unjust, in so far as it pertains to the farmers, and unfairly discriminates against the interests of agriculture by virtually abandoning the New England, New York, and coast trade to Canada and other foreign countries, by reason of proximity and cheap water transportation, which in effect bring the producers in foreign countries closer to these markets than our American farmers in the interior, who must transport by the more costly methods of rail.

The great bulk of agricultural products imported into the United States from Canada and countries beyond the sea are consumed in our seaboard cities and great manufacturing centers of the East, which should be preserved as a market for the products of the farmers of the United States.

Your petitioners respectfully maintain that the difference in the cost of agricultural productions in the United States and in foreign countries should be regarded as a just measure of the duties which may be laid upon the products of foreign agriculture for the protection of American farmers.

The cost of agricultural productions, including the transportation in the United States, exceeds the cost of such productions in Canada, including transportation, by 44 per cent, owing to the price of labor. This is at least 10 per cent in excess of the duties now imposed by law upon the products of foreign agriculture, and the cost of agricultural productions in countries beyond the sea is even less than in Canada, owing to the same cause.

The Wilson tariff bill, as it now stands, is unjust as between the manufacturers and the farmer, who is a producer of wool, flax, and other fibrous productions that enter into the manufacture of cloth. If the manufacturer should have free wool, then the farmer should have free cloth.

We ask only for justice, that you treat the farmer as others are treated.

The placing of agricultural implements on the free list in compensation for the reduction of the duty on agricultural products is ridiculed by every intelligent farmer, as no agricultural implements are imported of any consequence, being much inferior to those manufactured in the United States, which are sold to the farmer for a less price and on easier terms than in any country in the world.

In view of the foregoing facts we earnestly ask all true friends of the farmer to insist upon a fair revision of the tariff, and that in any legislation upon the subject that the present agricultural schedule be maintained, or otherwise defeat the proposed legislation.

We also desire to impress upon your minds the fact that we do not consider the present financial system of our country as satisfactory, and believe it is the cause of much of the financial embarrassment. Our members generally favor an increase in the volume of the currency to meet the business requirements and revive the industries of our country and give employment to labor.

The majority of our farmers are bimetallists. They may differ somewhat as to the details, but earnestly desire to maintain both silver and gold as money, with an issue of United States Treasury notes, if necessary, to bring the volume of the currency up to at least $40 per capita. They favor such financial legislation and such an adjustment of the tariff as will secure our American markets for American labor and American capital, which will again start our country on a prosperous career.

We therefore respectfully petition your honorable body to favorably consider the great agricultural interests of our country, upon which the prosperity of all other industries depends, and so legislate that the foregoing suggestions, which we have felt it our duty to present, may be enacted into law, believing that it will be the means of bringing contentment and happiness to thousands of rural homes and prosperity to our whole country.

Respectfully submitted.

A VOICE FROM IDAHO.

As reflecting the views of a former member of this body, now governor of the State of Idaho, long a citizen of the State of Oregon, thoroughly familiar with all the varied industries, not only of Idaho, but of the Pacific coast, I beg to incorporate in my remarks the following communication addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives by Governor W. J. McConnell, of Idaho:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, Boise City, Idaho, January 20, 1894

Mr. SPEAKER and Members of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

GENTLEMEN: The State of Idaho, vast in resources and possibilities, having already felt the damaging influence of legislation unfriendly to silver, now contemplates with alarm the efforts of the majority in Congress to pass what is known as the "Wilson bill." Although the representatives of the great manufacturing districts of the East and South viewed with complacency the destruction of the silver-mining interest of the West, apparently unmoved by the suffering of the wives and children of the thousands of miners thrown out of employment, untouched by silent tunnels, noiseless mills, and deserted cabins, yet the people of the State of Idaho in this hour of present and impending disaster, are moved with profound sorrow by the daily recitals of the sufferings of the unemployed in the manufacturing cities east of the Mississippi River.

Leaving the responsibility of removing the distress of these unfortunate people to those whose methods imposed their present condition upon them, I desire to direct your attention to the industries of the young State of Idaho, and briefly recite to you the probable results, to them, of the proposed tariff legislation. Our principal products—ranking in importance in the order named—are gold, silver, lead, wool, wheat, fruit, flaxseed, horses, and cattle. Our first product, gold, will no doubt be increased in output, for with diminished wages many placers can be worked that under the former scale of wages remained untouched.

Regarding our second resource, silver, Congress has already destroyed that industry, giving in its place a promise of the immediate restoration of prosperity, which has, however, only been verified by the establishment of "soup houses," and additional work for our sheriffs and their deputies. The Wilson bill, if it become a law, will close all our lead mines until the necessities of the miners compel them to accept wages the same or less than the peons of Mexico are now paid. Before Congress adopts legislation calculated to degrade America's workingmen to that level, wisdom would seem to dictate that the members should pause and reflect as to the consequences liable to ensue.

Our fourth industry, wool, can not be successfully maintained in competition with the Australian product. The manager of the New South Wales exhibit at the Columbian Exhibition boldly displayed a sign, as follows: "We can raise wool for 6 cents per pound." Beneath which was the pertinent inquiry: "What can you raise it for?" The management of the Exposition caused this sign to be removed, stating that it was politics, and that no politics could be allowed on the grounds. Idaho can not meet this kind of competition and maintain the dignity of the American laborer.

Our fifth industry, wheatgrowing, is so depressed that the farmers who are engaged in it are on the verge of bankruptcy; whether the claim that the price of wheat has been influenced by the price of silver be admitted by any considerable number of people or not, the fact remains that, aided and abetted by those high in place in this Government, English agents have been able to purchase silver in this country to be used in buying wheat in India at prices which mean ruin to the silver miners, and destruction to the farmers who have been obliged to sell in competition with wheat thus purchased; it is your duty to determine the relief to be afforded. Our sixth industry, fruit growing, although yet in its infancy, has assumed such proportions and attained such a degree of success as to challenge the admiration of all who take an interest in this important factor in the economy of the farm.

At the recent horticultural exhibit at the World's Fair, Idaho carried off first prizes for the best exhibit of two of the most important products of the orchard—apples and prunes. By the passage of the Wilson bill this industry will be crippled, if not destroyed. The culture of flaxseed, which ranks seventh among our industries, can not be continued under the provisions of the Wilson bill. The protective tariff, which has not been less that 25 cents per bushel since the culture of that staple was begun on the Pacific coast, has alone prevented the product of India from driving our farmers out of the market

I need not inform you what wages are paid the coolie farm laborers of India; nor need I emphasize the fact that the saddest of all the sad days which may come to the American people will be that day when the laboring men of America will be obliged to either starve, or work for such a pittance as is doled out by princely mandate to the paupers of the Old World and its dependencies. The results which I predict will be experienced in the State of Idaho will apply as well to all the States of the West; therefore, I appeal to you through that sense of justice which is supposed to dominate the actions of our representative men, and urge that, in levying a tariff for revenue only—if such be your intention—that you will remember the farmers, woolgrowers, stockmen, miners, and lumbermen of the West, as well as the planters in the South, and the manufacturers in the East.

W. J. McCONNELL, Governor.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

Another feature of the pending bill in direct opposition to American interests and American industries and the wage-workers of the United States is the provision which strikes down that portion of the McKinley act providing for reciprocity treaties with other countries. Under that provision of the McKinley act a number of treaties were negotiated with different foreign countries, the most of them consummated within a year from the passage of the McKinley act. As exhibiting the vast increase of our trade with these several countries in virtue of these several treaties, I may be pardoned for reproducing here the following article from the Boston Commercial Union cited by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in his able speech of yesterday:

It is cheering to know that against this decline in one direction there has been an increase in another. There are certain products of the United States that have been steadily increasing their hold on foreign markets. The exports of 1893 exhibit them as follows:

The increased use of electricity of course accounts for our increased exports of copper ingots, and Canada West is the purchaser that has been absorbing so large an increase of Yankee coal.

Generally speaking, it will be seen that thirty years of protection have transformed us from a country exporting little but the natural products of the soil into a country of vast and varied industries. The home market is, of course, much the more valuable, for, as the Boston Journal so admirably summarized the situation the other day, the United States consumes 20 per cent of all the sugar, 25 per cent of all the cotton, 30 per cent of all the coffee and copper, 33 per cent of all the steel and iron and wool and rubber, 40 per cent of all the coal, and 50 per cent of all the tin produced.

The future of the foreign trade of the United States lies not in shipping cotton to England, but flour to Cuba and cloth to Brazil.

It is an interesting fact that though the number of yards of cotton cloth exported from the United States dropped to 159,417,927 in 1893 from 171,754,048 in 1892, the value of our exports increased from 10,299,220 in 1892 to 10,347,521 in 1893. China's purchases of plain brown cottons fell off one-half, but the West Indies, Brazil, and Central America increased their purchases of colored and high-cost cottons to such an extent that the value of the total exported increased. The quantity of Brazil's purchases increased one-third, the value increased one-half.

The increase in our exports of manufactures of iron and steel is notably large; two-thirds of this represents engines and machinery. Cuba is our largest customer for machinery; Mexico and Brazil are liberal purchasers, as indeed is Great Britain, but whereas, except in hardware, England shows a decreasing disposition to buy, our Latin American neighbors have been increasing their purchases.

Is it not profitable to keep customers and enlarge the group of customers who buy our most expensive products and put a duty on those of European manufacture? The present House of Representatives does not think so. It has voted to abandon these new foreign markets for our manufactured products and to let down the bars of our own markets to the foreign producer.

The future historian of the United States will wonder at the folly of a nation thus ready to surrender not only its possessions, but its prospects.

THE CASH VALUE OF RECIPROCITY.

In the last two editions of the Bulletin we have shown statistically how the European markets for our staples are slipping away from us. The very valuable annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics makes it possible to show also how American exports have blossomed in the new Latin American countries under the influence of reciprocity treaties.

The year 1892 is given for comparison because that year is the latest available for the French and English statistics. The German statistics are not at hand for a later year than 1891:

United States exports.

To—	1890.	1892.	1893.
Guatemala	$1,396,388	$1,809,577	$1,713,142
Honduras	522,631	478,947	442,907
Nicaragua	1,270,073	1,187,189	812,654
Salvador	886,231	1,274,021	1,118,054
British West Indies	8,074,433	7,995,185	7,912,341
San Domingo	926,651	984,188	1,108,733
Cuba	12,609,509	17,622,411	23,604,094
Puerto Rico	2,247,700	2,808,631	2,502,788
Brazil	11,902,406	14,240,009	12,339,584
British Guiana	2,011,122	1,885,542	1,953,012

The two countries of prime importance are Cuba and Brazil. In Cuba the heavy increase is due to an enormous relative increase in our exports of machinery, boots and shoes, corn, wheat flour, hog products, and lumber.

In Brazil the articles that have jumped furthest are railroad cars, machinery and hardware, bacon and pork, boards and furniture. More recently there has been a growth in the value of cotton cloths.

The reciprocity destroyer carefully covers up these figures and exults over the fact brought out by the above tables, that our exports to certain smaller countries with whom we have reciprocity treaties have apparently declined. Among these are Honduras, British Guiana, Nicaragua, and the British West Indies.

In the case of the British West Indies the imports of Bermuda from the United States are included in the Department's figures for 1890 and excluded in 1892. As the annual imports of Bermuda are $1,500,000, the bulk being food supplies from the United States and Canada, the apparent small decrease in the years selected is more than accounted for.

As to the genuine decreases, let us see how other countries have fared in Latin America. Great Britain's exports to Central America were £987,168 in 1890, and but £829,152 in 1891. France's exports to Central America were 1,836,329 francs in 1890 and 1,127,911 francs in 1892.

Both these countries show a net loss for all Central America. Taking all Central America together, the United States shows a very handsome relative net gain.

Great Britain exported to the British West Indies goods to the value of £2,634,472 in 1890, and but £2,184,349 in 1892. We are really gaining upon England in her own colonies.

Haiti and San Domingo are unfortunately classed together, one being out of and the other in our reciprocity arrangement. England's exports to the two fell during the two years in question from £528,357 to £247,971, France's from 13,474,176 francs to 9,294,461 francs. Our substantial gain in San Domingo almost offsets the loss in Haiti. Our exports to the two have fallen but from $6,028,115 to $5,947,618, a trifling decline when compared with England's. (When three years are considered, American exports show a gain.)

England sold to the Spanish West Indies goods to the value of £1,876,756 in 1890, and but £1,473,171 in 1892. France's exports fell from 11,671,054 to 4,792,378 francs in the same year. As noted above, our exports in the two years increased 40 per cent, and in three years nearly 100 per cent.

England did increase her exports to Brazil from £7,458,628 to £7,910,320 (mostly in jute goods and telegraph wire). France, however, fell from 81,010,705 francs in 1890 to 61,520,091 francs in 1892. The United States gained more rapidly than England.

More than this, President Harrison proclaimed a specially hostile tariff against Colombia, Venezuela, and Haiti. It has been represented that the injury thus supposed to be done our exports has more than counterbalanced the gain secured in the other countries.

Now, our exports to Colombia have risen from $2,522,351 in 1890 to $3,047,620 in 1893; our exports to Venezuela rose from $3,984,230 in 1890 to $4,142,051 in 1893. Our exports to Haiti, as noted above, did decline a little in 1892, but from 1890 to 1893 they rose from $5,101,464 to $5,170,634.

As compared with 1890 we have in 1893 increased our exports to six out of the ten Latin American countries under reciprocity treaties and lost in four. The political uncertainty in Brazil in 1893 and the removal of Bermuda from the general classification of the West Indies make the apparent loss than the actual gain.

However, as it stands, we have gained net in our exports to these countries $12,527,529 since 1890. We have lost but $577,897, and the countries that are buying less of us have become even more niggardly customers of European countries.

These new Latin American markets have in part at least offset the dwindling European demand for our old-time staples. The great Sclavonic countries with India and Egypt may break down the European demand for our petroleum, our wheat, and our cotton. Here, however, are markets they can not control.

Will President Cleveland civilly hand them also to Great Britain?

SOME OF THE DISASTERS WHICH HAVE AFFLICTED OUR COUNTRY SINCE MR. CLEVELAND'S INAUGURATION, MARCH 4, 1893.

What are some of the things which have happened since the inauguration of the present Administration, March 4, 1893, affecting the general welfare and prosperity of this country, and to what extent may these fearful happenings be justly denominated, not merely as coincidences, but as dreadful consequences of the threatenening policies of the Democratic Administration? Since then, bankruptcy has fastened its cold and icy grip on the owners and operators of more than one-fifth of all the railroad mileage in the United States. Property of this one class representing a capital in stocks and bonds of more than $1,750,000,000 is no longer controlled by owners, but is in the hands of receivers who must in all things proceed according to the order and under the direction of the courts appointing them.

Reliable statistical returns for the month of February of the present year show a loss on 123 roads, operating 95,945 miles of track, amounting to $4,654,203, or 2.54 per cent, and making a total decrease in earnings in the first two months of this year of $9,605,851, as against a gain of $539,310 last year, and as against gains of from three to seven millions in each of the three preceding years.

Since the incoming of the present Administration, according to the bulletin of the American Iron and Steel Association, over one hundred iron and steel manufacturing establishments and iron ore mining properties have gone into the hands of receivers, assignees, or sheriffs, while at least one-fifth of the capital invested in these industries has been absolutely sunk since Mr. Cleveland's election.

In the first ten months of the present Administration there was a shrinkage in the total bank clearings of this country from the total clearings during the last ten months of the year 1892 of the almost incomprehensible sum of $8,259,292,017. But, oh! says one, it was the Sherman silver act that was the cause of this. But in reply to this I beg attention to the important and undeniable historic fact that while the shrinkage in bank clearings for the two months preceding the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act was $2,634,599,247, the falling off for the two months immediately following such repeal was $3,339,684,035, or greater than the shrinkage of the two months immediately preceding the repeal by $705,084,788. The shrinkage in the month of September, 1893, before the repeal act was passed, was $1,467,649,673, while that of December following the repeal in October was $1,947,505,663.

But this is not all. Neither the repeal of the Sherman act nor the advent of the new year has availed to stem the downward course of financial and business affairs in this country. In the months of January and February of the present year, according to Bradstreet, the shrinkage in business, as indicated by the volume of bank clearings, reached the enormous sum of $1,890,312,536 in January and $1,867,645,918 in February, making the startling aggregate for these two months of $3,757,958,454.

And yet, Mr. President, during the special session, the claim was insistently made by the gold monometallists that all that was necessary to bring prosperity, to increase trade, to cause the flow of money into this country, to stop its export to foreign countries, was to wipe out of existence the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, which they denounced as responsible, in the main, for all these business and financial troubles. While these immense losses, amounting during the first year of Mr. Cleveland's Administration to considerably more than $12,000,000,000, or within a fraction of one-fifth of the total wealth of the country, only properly mark the extent of the loss in trade, it does not include the still infinitely greater losses and of a character, too, which strike a deadly blow at the farmers, the landowners, the producers, and the transportation interests of the country.

In that sad category may be reckoned nearly $325,000,000 decrease in the value of cattle, sheep, horses, swine, and other live stock; also the loss to the farmers of this country in the depression to ruinous rates, in the price of wheat, corn, oats, barley, and other cereals; in the depreciation of the value of real estate, to say nothing of the ruin that has been brought upon our mining industries by the absolute demonetization of silver, the closing of our silver mines, and the annihilation of innumerable other industries and enterprises depending on these for their existence and support.

But the sad catalogue of business disasters which have come to the people of this country since March 4, 1893, is far from complete until included in its sickening list is the statement of the 16,000 business failures which have occurred in that time, involving liabilities to the extent of $346,749,889, to say nothing of the great unfortunate army of unemployed and dependent people, aggregating, according to Bradstreet, 219,200 in New England, 787,000 in New York and New Jersey, 500,700 in the State of Pennsylvania alone, 680,650 in the central Western States, 240,700 in the Northwestern States, 165,715 in the Southern States, and 72,800 on the Pacific coast, footing the stupendous aggregate of unemployed and dependent in our country of 2,758,595, of whom 801,885 are stated to be unemployed, and 1,956,710 dependent. All this, Mr. President, was not so prior to the Presidential election of 1892.

SILVER.

The oft-reiterated assertion made during the past year that the Sherman silver act was the cause of driving gold from this country has been more than overwhelmingly answered from time to time by actual statistics. The report of the Bureau of Statistics for November, 1893, shows that the exports of gold from August, 1890, when the Sherman silver-purchase law went into effect, until the end of that year were but $4,042,221, while the imports of gold during the same period were over three times that amount or $13,731,249, showing a net of imports over exports of $9,689,028.

Now, why was this? All Europe at that time, by the enactment of that law, supposed it was the settled determination of the Government of the United States to adopt a silver policy of its own, regardless of the action of any of the European nations upon that subject. This policy then adopted enabled us to secure gold from Europe, and had it been steadfastly and vigorously maintained our imports of gold, all other things being equal, would have continued to exceed our exports. But whenever it was ascertained by the European nations that they were mistaken in regard to the determination of the United States upon the silver question, and it became plainly evident that the Administration was deferring to European nations upon the subject, Austria at once entered upon the business of demonetizing silver, and thus succeeded in extracting from us in the neighborhood of $100,000,000 in gold.

THE THREAT OF TARIFF REDUCTION HAS PROSTRATED TRADE.

But what has been the effect on the revenues of the Government since the inauguration of the present Administration? Under the operation of the McKinley tariff during the year 1892, the Government was enabled to pay all its expenses and had a surplus for that year of $9,915,453.66, whereas the surplus for the next fiscal year (1893) was considerably less than one-fourth that amount, or $2,341,674 only, while for the present year, instead of a surplus of nearly $10,000,000, as in 1892—the last year of President Harrison's Administration—we have a deficit of from seventy-five to one hundred millions, the present Secretary of the Treasury himself placing it in his last estimate at seventy-eight millions.

Why is this so? We have the same fiscal laws to-day that we had in 1892. This great change, therefore, can not be attributed to the laws, but to some other potent cause which has operated to check importations under those laws. And is this strange? Is it by any means curious or to be wondered at that merchants, large importers in this country, will reduce the amount of their purchases when an Administration having control of all the departments of the Government has proclaimed in favor of free trade and a large reduction in duties? This is one, the principal reason, why importations have fallen off, and why as a consequence the revenues of the Government have fallen off and instead of a surplus we have an immense deficiency staring us in the face

But this is not by any means the sole reason. By this proposed legislation the great industries of this country have been threatened, men have been thrown out of employment, and the ability of the people of this country to make purchases, as formerly, has been seriously impaired. The imports into this country upon which duties are levied by the McKinley act were much less during eleven months of 1893 than during the year 1892.

For the seven months ending January 31, 1894, there was a falling off in our imports of merchandise to the extent of $112,822,621, the value of our imports for this period, ending January 31, 1893, being $484,371,681; while for the latter period but $371,549,060. But it was on the dutiable portion of these imports that the falling off was the more marked, being of the value of $247,658,612 for the seven months ending January 31, 1893, and of but $167,605,321 for the seven months ending January 31, 1894, a falling off in this short period of $80,053,291. But in our exports of domestic merchandise for a like period there was a decrease amounting to $41,264,227, our exports for the seven months ending January 31, 1893, being $560,295,545; while for a like period, ending the 31st day of January, 1894, they were but $519,031,318.

In this connection it may not be out of place to attract attention to the deplorable fact—a fact which brings, or ought to bring at least, the blush to the face of every American, and the existence of which I shall not now stop to attempt to charge up to either of the great political parties, although much, I think, can be said on that subject to the advantage of the Republican party and the disadvantage of our political adversaries—and that is that of the imports of merchandise into this country during the seven months ending January 31, 1894, which were brought in steam and sailing vessels; but $72,358,179 were brought in American vessels—$42,378,365 in steam vessels and $29,979,814 in sailers—while $393,327,665 were brought in foreign vessels, $374,260,123 worth of which amount were brought in steamers and the balance, $19,067,542, in sailers.

But this is not all, nor by any means the worst; for of our total exports during this same period of seven months ending January 31 last, $22,640,484 in value were carried in cars and other land vehicles, but $40,535,192 in American vessels, $25,738,697 of which amount in steamers and $14,796,495 worth in sailers; while the enormous balance of our exports for this period, amounting to $455,855,642 in value, was carried in foreign vessels, $408,765,619 of which balance was carried in foreign steamers and $47,090,023 in foreign sailers.

OUR NATIONAL FINANCES.

In this connection a comparison of the state of the public debt at the commencement and close of President Harrison's Administration with its present state is interesting and instructive. At the close of President Cleveland's first Administration, or rather at the end of the fiscal year July 1, 1888, the entire public debt was $1,063,004,894. This was reduced during the Administration of Mr. Harrison, or rather between July 1, 1888, and July 1, 1892, $221,438,431, it being but $841,526,463 at the latter date.

By the sale of bonds and the depletion of cash in the Treasury, which is taken into account in ascertaining the amount of the entire public debt, it has been increased since July 1, 1892, and nearly the whole of which has occurred since March 4, 1893, to the enormous extent of $165,791,542. And while the entire interest-bearing debt was, July 1, 1892, but $585,029,330, it is now $625,872,000, or an increase of $40,841,470, which means an increase in the annual payments of interest of over $2,000,000.

THE COUNTRY'S PROGRESS UNDER A PROTECTIVE POLICY.

What more overwhelmingly convincing argument in favor of the protective policy could be desired than the history of the material development and physical progress of this country under that policy, until the dismal shadow of the approaching change of that policy cast its deadly and demoralizing influence over our fair land? Contrast the total wealth of our country at the different periods, 1860, 1870, 1880, and 1890, and it tells a story of material development and human progress unparalleled by that of any other country since the creation of man.

In 1860 our total wealth was $16,159,616,068; in 1870 it was $30,068,518,507, an increase in this decade of 85.7 per cent, notwithstanding the fact that during this period occurred a fearful devastation and destruction of wealth by the civil war. In 1880 it was $43,642,000,000, and in 1890, $65,037,091,197 or an increase in this decade of $21,395,091,197, or an increase of, within a small fraction, 50 per cent.

In 1860, at the close of the existence of the free-trade tariff of 1846, as slightly modified by the act of 1857, our wealth per capita was but $308, while in 1870 it was $780. In 1880 it was $870 and in 1890, $1,039, or an increase per capita in the last decade of $169 to every man, woman, and child in the Republic, although our population during the same decade had increased nearly 25 per cent (24.86) from 50,155,783 in 1880 to 62,622,250 in 1890.

RAILROAD DEVELOPMENT.

In every department of enterprise the development under the protective policy of this country has been the wonder of the age, and in no department has this fact been more clearly emphasized than in railroad development. And in no respect is this more plainly shown than by contrasting this development with the progress made under a free-trade tariff. During the fourteen years of the existence of the much-lauded Walker tariff, or free-trade tariff, from 1846 to 1861, the whole number of miles of railroad constructed in this country was 24,150 miles, or an average increase of but 1,725 miles each year during this period; whereas the number of miles constructed during the fourteen years ensuing the close of the war, that is, from 1866 to 1879 inclusive, was 56,495 miles, or an average of 4,035 miles each year, while for the fourteen years from 1880 to 1893, inclusive, there were built 89,200 miles, or an average of 6,371 miles each year

And as indicating the vastness of this business, attention is attracted to statistics as given in Poor's Railroad Manual, showing that there is invested in this one industry, capital and funded debt (stocks and bonds), the enormous sum of $10,268,169,042, with annual gross earnings of $1,191,857,099, $816,716,759 accruing from freight and $315,140,340 from passengers, with net earnings amounting to $352,817,405, and paying dividends of $81,536,811.

Notwithstanding the fearful depression in prices during the past twenty years, caused mainly, as I believe, by the demonetization of silver in 1873 and hostile silver legislation since that time under the countervailing stimulus of the protective policy, the augmentation in wealth in its every department has been the wonder of the time. This is illustrated in a great variety of ways, but better than all others by a comparison of the census reports for different decades.

It is clearly shown by the census of 1890, in connection not only with the increased number of manufactories and manufactured products, but also in the increase in the number and value of farms and farm products, live stock, etc. In 1880 there were in the United States 4,008,907 farms, of the total value, including buildings, of $10,197,096,776, while according to the census of 1890 there were 4,564,641 farms, of the value of $13,279,252,649, or an increase of 555,734 or 13.86 per cent in the number of farms and an increase of 30.23 per cent in their valuation.

Again, the value of farm implements and machinery on these farms in 1890 was $494,247,467, as against $406,570,055 in 1880, or an increase in this decade of 21.58 per cent. The value of live stock on farms in this country in 1890 (June 1) was $2,208,767,573, as against $1,500,384,707 in 1880, or an increase in this decade of $708,482,866, or 47.21 per cent.

Again, the total value of farm products in 1879 was $2,212,540,927, while in 1890 it was $2,460,107,454, or an increase over that of 1879 of $247,566,627, or 11.19 per cent.

The farmers in this country, moreover, notwithstanding all they had to contend with during the decade from 1880 to 1890, produced 246,972,181 more pounds of butter in 1890 than they did in 1880—the number of pounds produced in 1880 being 777,250,287, as against 1,024,223,468 pounds in 1890, or an increase of 31.78 per cent. These statistics, however, only include the butter produced on farms and do not include that made in butter factories.

Nor has this development been confined to any one section of the country nor to any one product. The total cotton acreage in this country in 1879 was but 14,408,019 acres and the total production in that year but 5,755,359 bales of 453 pounds net, aggregating 2,607,177,627 pounds, whereas the acreage ten years later (in 1889) had increased to 20,175,270 acres, or an increase in the acreage in these ten years of 5,695,251 acres, or 39.33 per cent, while the product in 1889 was 7,472,511 bales of 477 pounds net—the size of the bale having been increased from 453 to 477 pounds—aggregating 3,564,387,747 pounds, or an increase of 957,210,120 pounds, or 36.71 per cent over that of ten years previous.

So also in the production of tobacco. We produced in 1889 15,595,489 pounds more than in 1879. Our total tobacco product in the latter year was 472,661,167 pounds, and in 1889 the product was 488,256,646 pounds. And in this connection I desire to attract attention to the fact, perhaps not generally known, that the far Western States of Oregon and California are beginning to devote considerable attention to the raising of tobacco.

There were in cultivation in the following three States in 1889 acreage as follows: California 27 acres, producing 12,907 pounds; Washington 25 acres, producing 7,040 pounds, and Oregon 12 acres, producing 3,325 pounds.

Again, the total area devoted to the cultivation and production of cereals in the United States in 1889 was greater by 21,585,766 acres, or 18.20 per cent greater than in 1879. In latter year the acreage was 118,631,779 acres, while in 1889 it was 140,217,455 acres. There has also been an increase in the production of cereals in 1889 over that in 1879 of 821,236,675 bushels, the product in the latter year being 2,697,579,229 bushels as against 3,518,816,904 bushels in 1889.

During the decade 1880–1890—according to the census—there was an increase in the number of manufacturing establishments in this country of 102,119; the total number in 1880 being 253,282, as against 355,401 in 1890. This is an increase of over 41 per cent. The capital invested in 1890 reached the enormous figure of $6,124,475,305, and the wages paid $2,282,823,265. The materials used in manufactures amounted to $5,158,865,333, and the value of the production $9,370,107,264.

WAGES

Another significant fact, evidencing the good results of the protective policy on the wage-earners of the United States, is to be found in the fact that in the year 1880, their average earnings were but $347.86 per year, while in 1890, according to the census, these average earnings had increased to $485.10, or an average increase to the wage-workers of the country annually of $137.24, and this in the face of the other significant fact that the census shows that the number of wage-workers had increased in that decade 65.74 per cent. The increase in wages paid was 131.13 per cent, in cost of materials 47.77 per cent, and in value of products 69.27 per cent.

CONCLUSION.

But what is the real character of the pending bill? In many, indeed in the great majority of its vital schedules, it breathes the spirit of free trade with all its blighting consequences. In these it mercilessly assails capital and labor alike. It strikes a deadly blow at this industry and that, demoralizing labor, reducing wages, destroying confidence, breeding distrust, paralyzing trade, while in other portions of the bill its provisions proceed along the lines of protection at high-water mark. Sugar, a common necessary of life, is taxed, while lemonade, soda water and other similar foreign waters, to tickle the fancy and sate the appetite of those able to indulge in these luxuries, nicely put up in plain, green or colored molded, or pressed-glass bottles, and fashion plates engraved on steel or copper or on wood, colored or plain, and paintings in oil or water colors, in which the four hundred of the cities are more especially interested, are admitted free of duty.

Rice being a product solely of the South, is protected to the extent of 83.89 per cent ad valorem, while the lumber, and the wool, and the coal, and the barley, and the hops, and the prunes, and the apples, and the hay, and the vegetables, and various other products, the great proportion of which are produced in the North, are given little or no protection, and the great majority of them placed on the free list.

The bill as it stands to-day is based on no definite, well-recognized principle or policy of customs taxation. It is neither free trade nor protection, and yet it is both. But one consideration seems to have been uppermost in the minds of its makers, and that is, how shall we frame this bill, wherein shall we make it free trade and wherein protection in its policy, so as to assure us of enough votes to secure its passage? This, Mr. President, is statesmanship of the highest order.

In its general characteristics this bill reminds one of the lines of Wordsworth:

The swan on still St. Marys Lake,
Float double swan and shadow.

The bill is sectional in the extreme in its general make-up, giving protection to the products and industries of one section and denying that protection to another. In a word, the pending bill is a legislative monstrosity, with the head of a man, the arms of a dragon, the tail of a fish and the claws of a bear. It is un-American, un-Democratic, un-Republican. It is a dangerous menace to the prosperity and general welfare of the people of the United States, and hence it is that the voice of patriotism, of Americanism, of Republicanism, and of real Democracy, demands that it be strangled in the legislative womb and never be permitted to be born.

Mr. CHANDLER (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will not withdraw that motion for a moment. I think we ought to have a brief executive session in order that we may at least make some references.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is very anxious to proceed with the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. He will be in the Chamber in a moment, and if he does not appear I desire an executive session of a few minutes at least.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

I transmit herewith copies of certain dispatches from the United States minister at Honolulu, received by the Secretary of State since my message of March 19, 1894.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 13, 1894.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. Was a motion made to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Missouri will be in the Chamber in one moment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, he is here.

Mr. CHANDLER. I renew my motion to adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the motion will not be agreed to, but that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to know whether debate is in order on a motion to adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that debate is not in order on a motion to adjourn. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the Senate do now adjourn. [Putting the question.] The noes have it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], whom I do not see in his seat, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that, if agreeable to him, we transfer our pairs and vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I should prefer to let my pair remain as it is.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. HOAR (when Mr. PUGH'S name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], who is absent in consequence of illness.

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHANDLER (after having voted in the negative). I voted nay inadvertently; but I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY], and withdraw my vote.

Mr. DIXON. Has the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. DIXON. I am paired with that Senator, and withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to withdraw my vote, and announce my pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH].

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH. My colleague [Mr. GORDON] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP] that, if agreeable to him, he and I transfer our pairs. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. SHOUP. Very well.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] will then stand paired with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], I vote "nay."

Mr. SHOUP. I vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY. Before leaving the Chamber the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] desired me, if there was a call of the yeas and nays, to announce his pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. RANSOM. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], so that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and myself can vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I vote "yea."

Mr. CAREY (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to state that my colleague [Mr. HUNTON] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. HILL. I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 27; as follows:

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum has voted.

Mr. COCKRELL. The motion is lost.

Mr. HILL. I rise for information, to inquire——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion has been lost.

Mr. COCKRELL. However, no quorum has voted. Let the roll be called to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HILL. If it is in order, will the Secretary be kind enough to inform us how many pairs were announced just now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The stenographer can make that announcement. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for that information. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to any further delay. The Chair has directed the Secretary to call the roll.

Mr. HILL. I do not care for a detailed statement, but I wish to know the number of pairs announced. I do not care to have the names: that is unnecessary.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to any further delay in the calling of the roll.

Mr. HILL. This is a parliamentary inquiry. A Senator has a right to have that information. I desire to make a point of order upon it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the roll be called.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll, and meanwhile the Chair will get the information for the Senator from New York.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Dixon,	Hill,	Pasco,
Bate,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Peffer,
Berry,	Dubois,	Kyle,	Perkins,
Blackburn,	Frye,	Lindsay,	Quay,
Blanchard,	Gallinger,	McPherson,	Ransom,

Call,	Gibson,	Martin,	Smith,
Carey,	Gorman,	Mitchell, Oregon	Vest,
Chandler,	Gray,	Mitchell, Wis.	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walsh.
Coke,	Hawley,	Palmer,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York that nine pairs were announced on the previous roll call.

Mr. HILL. So if those pairs had been entered upon the Journal——

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I object. There is no debatable question before the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no debatable question before the Senate.

Mr. HILL. Everything is debatable in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 6556, being the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to a question of order. The motion now before the Senate is a motion to adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. The motion to adjourn was voted down. It did not require a quorum to vote down the motion to adjourn, as the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire only too well knows.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know all that the Senator from Missouri knows. I wish I did. I understand that as soon as the presence of a quorum is established, the preceding question on which a quorum did not vote must be taken again.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not the case on a motion to adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that on a motion to adjourn that is not necessary. Does the Chair understand the Senator from New York to rise to a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. HILL. My parliamentary inquiry is as to whether, as long as the record of this body shows that there were 45 Senators present——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators answered to their names.

Mr. HILL. Thirty-six Senators voted before, and there were nine pairs announced by Senators who were present. That makes a quorum actually present, who responded to their names and told the reason, not why they were absent, but why they were present. That constitutes a quorum of this body and entitles it to do business under the well-regulated rules which have prevailed in other bodies and which ought to prevail here. I make the point of order that there was a quorum actually present, which the Vice President has a right to recognize. The President of the Senate may take time upon this question, if it is desired, before it is ruled upon.

Mr. DUBOIS and Mr. QUAY addressed the Chair.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought I was recognized.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Missouri, but the Senator from New York rose to a point of order.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from Idaho on the point of order.

Mr. DUBOIS. I simply desire to correct the Senator from New York as to his statement of fact. For instance, my colleague [Mr. SHOUP] announced his pair, and afterwards that pair was transferred by an arrangement with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who also had announced a pair, and both my colleague and the Senator from Tennessee voted. That was done in several instances.

Mr. BUTLER. That was not counted as a pair, then.

Mr. DUBOIS. The point made by the Senator from New York is based on the supposition that all those who announced pairs were present and were not voting. As a matter of fact, the pairs were transferred and almost all those who were present and paired did vote. Upon the statement of fact I submit that the point of order at this time is not well taken.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make one suggestion, if the Senator will pardon me. I do not understand this to be a practical question, or that the Senator from New York desires to raise it now. As I understood him, he only rose to pay a tribute to the great wisdom and sagacity of the late Speaker of the House of Representatives [Mr. REED]; that is all.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, on this point——

Mr. BUTLER. I call attention to the fact that our friends on the other side——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] on the question of order raised by the Senator from New York.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought I was recognized, but I see I was mistaken.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will yield to me to complete my sentence?

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The point of order made by the Senator from New York calls attention to the additional fact that our friends on the other side are filibustering very industriously and actively against the passage of the tariff bill. That fact is disclosed.

Mr. GALLINGER. We will take the responsibility of it.

Mr. QUAY. I believe I have the floor now. I merely rose to inquire of the Senator from New York if he desired to suggest the adoption of the Reed rule in the Senate. It seems to me that is the purport of his suggestion.

Mr. HILL. I do not recognize the fact that Mr. REED has any monopoly upon a simple and plain rule like this. It can be adopted by any body, and it can be recognized as existing under the ordinary principles of parliamentary law.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does not the Senator from New York claim the prior right of discovery?

Mr. HILL. I decline to answer that question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to say a single word on the point of order. As I remember the matter, a vote was taken to adjourn. The declaration was made that there was not a quorum present. The Vice-President recognized that fact and directed a call of the Senate, which developed a quorum. The Chair then decided that further business was in order. I submit that the point of order raised by the Senator from New York comes too late, and that before it can be considered it must be raised again at some time when the want of a quorum is developed, as was the case on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has not yet ruled on the question. He will hear the Senator from Connecticut on the point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand the Senator from New York claims there was a quorum here at the time the vote was taken to adjourn. I suppose, then, his point is that we really adjourned five minutes ago. If so, where are we now?

Mr. HARRIS. But the vote was against an adjournment.

Mr. HILL. An adjournment is not had until it is declared from the Chair.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senator from Connecticut did not listen to the announcement of the result. In answer to the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I take occasion to call attention to the fact that there is a very broad difference between the condition suggested by the Senator from New York, namely, that though a quorum may not have voted upon a motion where a quorum was not required, the announcement of pairs showed that more than a quorum was present, and the employment and application of arbitrary rules that may have been employed without precedent or authority in other deliberative bodies.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to inquire what is the point of order?

Mr. FRYE. There is no point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The last roll call discloses the presence of a quorum.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no point of order before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The last roll call discloses that a quorum is present, and the Chair recognizes the Senator from Missouri.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have been trying to get the floor for a long while to make a motion. It is evident we can not do any legislative business this evening, and rather than do nothing, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 14, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORGAN. By direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I report back the bill (S. 1481) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889, and to aid in the construction of the Maritime Canal of Nicaragua. The committee have stricken out all of the bill submitted to them except the enacting clause, and present a substitute for the same, which I suppose is now ready for the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say, before the bill goes to the Calendar, that at a later day, perhaps on Monday, I shall submit a written report in connection with the bill. I defer it now merely to enable members of the committee to have an opportunity to examine the report carefully before it is put in.

The report was subsequently submitted by Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 217) for the relief of the heirs of James Bridger, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAREY. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6442) to protect the birds and animals in the Yellowstone National Park, and to punish crimes in said park, and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator, before I decide whether to object to its consideration, if the bill proposes to change the boundaries of the park or has any relation to the controverted questions connected with it.

Mr. CAREY. This is a House bill, and is reported with an amendment——

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. TURPIE. The bill is too long. It would take all the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 756) for the application of the accretions of the Caracas awards of 1868 to the new awards made in 1889 and 1890, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1897) to regulate the laying and repairing of sidewalks in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 1898) to prevent the abuse of legal processes by United States courts and judges thereof, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1899) for the relief of William Pitsch; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PEFFER. I was requested by the Wage Workers' Political Alliance of the District of Columbia to introduce a bill, which I present, and ask to have referred to the Committee on Finance.

I suppose I need not again call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I do not agree with the philosophy of some of the bills which I introduce by request, but, as I stated once before in the presence of the Senate, I regard such bills as being somewhat in the nature of petitions, and while we may not agree with their reasoning, still they may be suggestive to us, and therefore useful.

The bill (S. 1900) to enable the public authorities to establish systems of public cooperation, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 1901) to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of B. J. Kimbrough, of the One hundred and tenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1902) for the relief of James B. Boyd, late a private in Company B, Seventy-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers and Battery H, Fourth Regiment United States Artillery; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1903) authorizing certain surveys to be made by the Coast Survey of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALSH introduced a bill (S. 1904) to amend section 719 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 719 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the words following:

"Nor shall any associate justice, or circuit judge, or judge of the circuit court, except when sitting as a member of an appellate court created by law, set aside, annul, or modify any decree, judgment, or order made by any other associate justice, circuit judge, or judge of the circuit court; and all applications for rehearing, or setting aside, or modifying the order, decree, or judgment shall be made to the judge or justice presiding when the same was made or granted, except when he is disqualified; and all applications for judicial orders in the circuit court shall be made and heard in the circuit where the cause is pending, unless the circuit judges of the circuit and the district judge of the district are both disqualified."

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. VEST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

JUDGMENTS IN INDIAN DEPREDATION CASES.

Mr. SHOUP submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to transmit to the Senate a list of the judgments rendered in the Court of Claims in Indian depredation cases since the 1st of July, 1892, together with a statement of the date when each was rendered, in whose favor rendered, the amount in each case, and the aggregate amount.

FISH AND SPONGE INDUSTRIES.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Fisheries, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Fisheries be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire and report to the Senate by bill or otherwise the conditions of the fisheries on the coasts and rivers of the United States, including the sponge fisheries, and the legislation necessary for the protection and the increase of the fish and sponges.

AMENDMENTS OF THE RULES.

Mr. HILL submitted the following resolutions; which were ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed:

RULE V.

Resolved, That subdivision 2 of Rule V of the Standing Rules of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"If at any time during the daily session of the Senate a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate; but no Senator while speaking shall be interrupted by any other Senator raising the question of the lack of a quorum, and the question as to the presence of a quorum shall not be raised oftener than once in every hour, but this provision shall not apply where the absence of a quorum is disclosed upon any roll call of the yeas and nays."

RULE IX.

Resolved, That Rule IX be amended by adding thereto the following section:

SEC. 2. Whenever any bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business, and the same shall have been debated on divers days, amounting in all to thirty days, it shall be in order for any Senator at any time to move to fix a time for the taking of a vote upon such bill or resolution, and such motion shall not be amendable or debatable, and shall be immediately put, and if passed by a majority of all the members of the Senate, the vote upon such bill or resolution, with all the amendments thereto which may be pending at the time of such motion, shall be had at the date fixed in such original motion without further debate or amendment, except by unanimous consent; and during the pendency of such motion to fix a date, and also at the time fixed by the Senate for voting upon bill or resolution, no other motion of any kind or character shall be entertained until such motion or such bill or resolution shall have been finally voted upon.

RULE XII.

Resolved, That Rule XII be amended by inserting an additional clause, as follows:

When upon a vote by yeas and nays it shall appear to the Presiding Officer upon recapitulation, and before the announcement of the result, that a quorum has not voted, he shall call upon Senators present who have not voted by name to vote, and shall direct the Secretary to add to the list of the Senators voting the names of the Senators present not voting, including those announcing pairs, or who may or may not be excused from voting, and to enter the same in the Journal; and if the whole number constitute a quorum, and it shall appear that a majority of a quorum (or two-thirds of a quorum where the Constitution prescribes a majority of two-thirds) has voted on either side, the question shall be deemed to have been determined, and the result shall be announced the same as if a quorum had voted.

HEARINGS ON PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be printed and lie over until Monday.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas there exists in many places and on the part of large numbers of citizens, individually and in organized bodies, a disposition to visit the city of Washington for the purpose of personally presenting to Congress their views with respect to pending and prospective measures of legislation; and

Whereas many of such persons and bodies are reported to be now on their way hither, with others likely to follow, for the purposes aforesaid:

Therefore, to the end that these our petitioners shall have full and respectful hearing and that proceedings attending their communication with the Senate shall be orderly and not subjected to interruption by the transaction of other public business,

Be it resolved, That a select committee of nine members of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President, to be known as the Committee on Communication, whose duty it shall be to receive all written or printed communications from citizens or bodies of citizens visiting the Capitol or intending to make such visit, for the purposes mentioned in the preamble hereto, and to receive all petitions, memorials, and remonstrances of such persons and bodies and hear them orally in relation to the matters and things about which they desire to communicate with the Senate. The committee shall report fully to the Senate from time to time as other committees report.

The Sergeant-at-Arms will set aside a convenient room in the Capitol or other building belonging to the Government for the use of said committee, and furnish the same with the necessary articles for the convenient dispatch of business.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to give notice that when the resolution comes up I shall move an amendment, making the Finance Committee of this body the committee for that purpose. It seems to me it is the proper committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUTLER in the chair). The resolution will be printed and lie over.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to state that I shall, early on Wednesday next, ask the leave of the Senate to submit some remarks, occupying perhaps an hour, on the subject of the proposed tariff and the income tax.

Mr. TURPIE. I wish to give notice that next Wednesday, after the conclusion of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], I shall ask the courtesy of the Senate to submit some remarks upon the pending bill on the subject of the tariff.

TARIFF HEARING.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], coming over from a previous day.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. QUAY on the 10th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate will hold a session on Saturday, 21st instant, from 12 o'clock noon until 1 p. m., to hear a committee of the workingmen's organizations of the United States in opposition to the bill (H. R. 4864) entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I presume that the resolution had better be disposed of this morning. The workingmen referred to in it are not Coxey's army, but the initial organization I believe is one of skilled workingmen in the city of Philadelphia, with probable cognate organizations in the city of Baltimore.

I was not aware of their proposition until a week or two ago, when I was waited upon by a subcommittee of these people.

They said they had sent their subcommittee here to wait upon the Committee on Finance to ask for a hearing in opposition to the Wilson bill; that the committee had dismissed them with more or less consideration, and that they had determined to appeal from the Senate committee to the Senate in a sort of Committee of the Whole.

Their programme is conveyed in a circular, which has accidentally come into my hands. It indicates that on next Friday, the 20th of April, a monster convention, consisting of 10,000 delegates, made up exclusively of workingmen, will meet in the city of Washington (I believe they have rented Convention Hall in this city), for the purpose of presenting and passing upon a series of resolutions and memorials. That is for the first day's business. On the following day, April 21, a week from to-day, the delegation, previous to high noon, will peacefully proceed, they say, along Pennsylvania avenue to the seat of government at the United States Capitol building, and present said resolutions and memorials to the honorable Senators therein assembled.

These gentlemen seem to me to be very much in earnest. I believe they are going to do what is proposed in this circular, and the question is what is the Senate going to do about it. I discouraged them. I said to them they might as well attempt to whistle off a pack of hounds in full view of a driven deer and in full cry, as to attempt to expostulate with a majority of this Chamber and attempt to deter them in their mad chase after the protected industries of this country and after their wages. But they said that their arrangements had progressed so far it was too late to recall them.

When I introduced the resolution I supposed that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who seems to be monarch of all he surveys, would in his benevolence allow us to conclude the weekly sessions on Friday of next week. I presume, however, that it is his intention that we shall sit next Saturday. I provided in the resolution for a session on Saturday, but that has become unnecessary, as we will undoubtedly meet on that day. The resolution should probably be amended, if it is the sense of the Senate that these people shall be heard, so that we shall take a recess on that day. I believe the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] proposes some amendment of that kind, to which I have no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert:

> That on Saturday, the 21st instant, the Senate shall take a recess from 1 o'clock until 4 o'clock p. m., to hear a committee of the workingmen's organizations of the United States on House bill 4864, entitled "An act to reduce taxation," etc.

Mr. QUAY. I am in favor personally of taking a recess and permitting this committee—that is, a subcommittee of 100 (which I believe they propose to constitute at the meeting), to appear on this floor and present their views in resolutions and memorials, which I presume is all they ask, in behalf of the 10,000, if they have 10,000 present, which I doubt. I believe there will certainly be two or three thousand assembled in this city, but of course they can not all have access to the Chamber. However, I submit the resolution to the Senate for their good judgment on the situation.

Mr. CHANDLER (to Mr. QUAY). Accept the amendment.

Mr. QUAY. I accepted the amendment in advance.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to assure the Senator from Pennsylvania that I have not the vanity to suppose nor do I suppose that I control any vote on this floor except one, and I am not absolutely sure that I always control that. But I do try to control my own vote, and I take it for granted that every Senator here does the same thing.

As to this organization, if it be an organization, I understand from the Senator that it has put, or proposes to put, in the form of printed memorials and printed resolutions the views that its members entertain, and that they propose to insist upon it. Their memorials or resolutions may be laid before the proper committee, or before this body but the idea of a mass meeting assembling in the Senate Chamber strikes me as somewhat novel and unreasonable.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. My understanding of their intention is that they will present their ideas of the situation, conveying their hostility to the Wilson bill in memorials and resolutions, and that they also desire to accompany them with an oral presentation of their ideas to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. No precedent, I imagine, can be found from the day the Constitution of the United States was ratified and this Government organized, for any such action as is proposed by the resolution. I think the hours referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania can be very much more profitably employed by an earnest consideration of the subject-matter by the Senate as organized in its legislative capacity than by opening our doors to a mass meeting and a general discussion in a mass meeting of questions pending before us.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance having charge of the consideration of financial questions.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to state that this committee with their proposition has already been before the Committee on Finance, so that it is not worth while to make the decisive action of the Senate upon the question depend upon a motion of this kind. If we are to decide the question here and now negatively, it ought to be done by a yea-and-nay vote for or against the proposition. What is asked here is not the judgment of the Committee on Finance, but of the Senate as a whole or en masse on this proposition.

Mr. HARRIS. I will withdraw the motion I have made and bring the Senate to a direct vote upon a test question. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. Before that is done I trust the Senator will withdraw his motion for a moment. The resolution has just been called to my attention, and I should be glad——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests to the Senator from South Carolina that the pending motion is a motion to lay on the table, and that it is not debatable.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that, sir, and I ask the Senator from Tennessee to withdraw the motion for a moment in order that I may——

Mr. HARRIS. Upon the request of the Senator from South Carolina I feel constrained to withdraw the motion and open the floodgates of debate upon this great question.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish to debate it. I simply want to know the object——

Mr. HARRIS. Still, if I withdraw the motion for the Senator from South Carolina, I dare not fail to withdraw it for any other Senator who asks me to do so. I will withdraw it if the Senator desires.

Mr. PEFFER. I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that I wish to be heard very briefly on the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from South Carolina ask that my motion be withdrawn?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I believe, in view of what has since transpired, that I shall not ask it.

Mr. HARRIS. I insist on my motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I offered the substitute, I trust the Senator from Tennessee will do me the courtesy to withdraw the motion for a moment. I have but a word to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the pending resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If the junior Senator from Pennsylvania will inform me how his colleague would vote on this proposition if present, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. QUAY. I have no doubt, without having consulted with my colleague, that he would vote in the negative.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I withhold my vote. If at liberty, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. DANIEL (when his name was called). I vote "yea." If I may be permitted, I wish to state that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is absent and has a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE]. I suggest that the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Washington may be considered paired, so that the Senator from Nebraska and I will be at liberty to vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator from Kentucky, I know, is in the building. I have been with him in a meeting of the Committee on Rules this morning, and I think he will probably be here soon.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator from Kentucky comes in, I shall then withdraw my vote, but I shall let it stand for the present.

Mr. MANDERSON. Very well.

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], and as he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], whom I do not see in his seat, and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE], but I am inclined to think that if he were here he would vote "yea," and I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when Mr. GORDON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GORDON] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM].

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], but believing that, if present, he would vote as I shall on this question, I take the liberty of voting. I vote "yea."

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS]. I understand he is not present, and therefore I shall withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH].

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON,] and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY (after having voted in the affirmative.) I forgot at the moment of voting that I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to the fact that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has entered the Chamber, so that of course there can not be the transfer of pairs suggested. I vote "yea."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I vote "yea."

Mr. DANIEL (after having voted in the affirmative). I beg the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I understand that he is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE]. I suggest that the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Washington may be considered as paired, and that will allow the Senator from New Hampshire to vote. I having already voted.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be agreeable to me to have that arrangement made. I vote "nay."

Mr. DANIEL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HUNTON] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. GEORGE. My colleague [Mr. MCLAURIN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. I have no doubt that if my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. PETTIGREW (after having voted in the negative). I have recorded my vote, but I should like to inquire if the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 9; as follows:

SUSPENDED PENSIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN on the 10th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and required to inform the Senate of the names and post-office address of all pensioners of the Government whose pensions have been suspended or canceled since the 4th of March, 1893, and the cause of such suspension or cancellation.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the resolution, and in doing so I wish to say that I think the substitute meets the approbation of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has the right to modify his resolution. The modification now offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the number of pensioners whose pensions have been suspended or canceled since the 4th day of March, 1893; the number of such pensioners whose pensions have been restored to the rate they were drawing at the time of such suspension or cancellation, the number, names, post-office address, and rate of those pensioners whose pensions have been partially restored since that date, and the cause of the reduction of the rate they were drawing at the date of the suspension or cancellation, and also the number of those who have been fully restored to the pension roll at the rate they were drawing at the time of suspension or cancellation, and the number, names, post-office address, and the cause of suspension or cancellation of those whose pensions have been entirely suspended or canceled.

Mr. PALMER. Is the resolution before the Senate for consideration now, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. PALMER. I have no disposition to oppose the passage of the resolution, but as it relates to a very interesting question, I ask that the communication which I send to the desk from the Commissioner of Pensions may be read, as it contains valuable information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF PENSIONS, FINANCE DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., April 13, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to state, in reply to your verbal request, that pursuant to decision of the Department dated May 27, 1893, there were 13,493 cases suspended under the act of June 27, 1890. Of this number the rate has been reduced in 1,820 cases; 1,604 names of pensioners have been dropped from the rolls, and payment has been resumed in 9,020 cases to April 12, 1894, leaving 1,049 cases in which payment of pension is still suspended, and upon which final action has not been taken.

Under date of March 12, 1894, I issued an order directing that payment of pension be resumed in every case pursuant to the act of December 21, 1893, in which the papers did not show that the case was ready for final action. This work is being rapidly pushed to a completion, and I am of opinion that in the course of fifteen days final action will have been taken in every case pursuant to said act.

Very respectfully,

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN M. PALMER,
United States Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

CLERKS IN TREASURY AND INTERIOR DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. GALLINGER, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate, in separate lists the names of all clerks and employés appointed, promoted, reduced, and dismissed since the 4th day of March, 1893, and the State to which each such clerk or employé is accredited; also that such of them as served in the Army or Navy of the United States at any time during the war of the rebellion shall be designated by some distinguishing mark in each list.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may go over, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed at this time to the consideration of House bill 6556.

By unanimous consent, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I must beg of my good friend from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] that he will not insist upon the proposition he has made.

Mr. MANDERSON. The parliamentary situation of the bill is, I believe, that the question is on its passage, it having been read three times. My suggestion of amendment yesterday was that if that which I proposed met with the approbation of the Senator in charge of the bill I should be glad to offer it; but as I understand from him that he prefers that the amendment shall not be urged, I shall not urge it; and so far as I am concerned I am ready to vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I had the floor to speak upon this bill yesterday before 1 o'clock, and I had hardly begun when the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] blew his inexorable bugle, sounding an advance upon the protected industries of the country, and I was prevented from speaking at that time.

I rose to suggest the unwisdom of the amendment which the Senator from Nebraska said he would propose to the bill; but as he does not propose the amendment, I do not care to detain the Senate by any remarks upon the question raised in the debate so far concerning the conduct of the Commissioner of Labor, Col. Carroll D. Wright, now in charge of the Census. I content myself with remarking that I believe there is absolutely nothing in this connection or in any other connection in the management of the Eleventh Census by the present Commissioner of Labor, Col. Wright, or by the present Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Hoke Smith, which affords just ground for criticism from any quarter.

Mr. HALE. Has the amendment been withdrawn?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment has not been offered, as the Chair understands.

Mr. MANDERSON. The amendment was not formally offered, but only suggested.

Mr. HALE. I only wish to say, having had something to do with census legislation heretofore, that I have with some care looked into this matter, and believing that neither the Secretary of the Interior nor Mr. Wright has been at fault in this matter, I am very glad that the amendment is not to be urged, thereby asking the Senate to do the absurd thing to undertake to edit census reports.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to prolong the debate, but there are one or two points as to which I desire to put on record my dissent from what some of my friends here have said.

Mr. North wrote a letter to Mr. Carroll D. Wright, which was put into the RECORD by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], in which Mr. North said:

I want to say that so far as the article reflects in any way upon you in connection with the revision and publication of that report, it is entirely without foundation. Without referring to anything that occurred respecting the report prior to the date upon which you took charge of the census, I have no possible ground for complaint in the manner of your treatment of me or of the report.

Mr. North carefully omits speaking of the proceedings before Mr. Wright took charge. I am not here to formulate any complaints against Mr. Wright, but I think there have been serious mistakes in judgment and some unauthorized conduct on his part. Mr. North also carefully omits to say that there was any reason for the omission; but he does say that, with his full consent and approval, the preliminary historical sketch in his report was omitted.

That was the grievance of Mr. North. I do not know that Mr. Wright was in any degree responsible for it, but I think the elimination was a very serious mistake. I think it reduces the value of that report.

As I stated the day before yesterday, in 1860 the takers of the census, then under full Democratic control, did give a history of the woolen industry from the beginning of the Government, so far as the imperfect censuses of various decades would permit, and that Mr. North continued that history in as brief and compact a form as any man could write, for he is a veteran in composition of that kind. Mr. North yielded because he was obliged to yield; he yielded gracefully, and said, "All right, leave it out."

Another matter: Mr. Wright in his letter to the Senator from Missouri says:

No statements of facts are being changed.

They are being omitted, however. I read the other day one exceedingly interesting summary of only about twelve or fifteen lines giving a brief comparison of the growth of the woolen industry in the respective nations of Great Britain and the United States. It would cost nothing to leave that in the report, and it is a very instructive and perfectly legitimate comment upon the census. A census is not solely for the purpose of giving us figures as they stand to-day, but the value of a census is in a comparison with previous stages in our growth and, if need be, in comparison with a great rival in great industries. That is the value of it.

They tell me that you can go and find these figures. How many men could afford the time or would be likely to go to the census of 1880, 1870, 1860, 1850, and 1840? Would they not expect that when the Government made its official census it would give enough of the preceding census to show the serious and fundamental changes.

Mr. Wright says:

No plates have been destroyed.

Mr. Wright misunderstands me, or I misunderstand him. He would not willfully convey a wrong impression. I have before me what I suppose to be a regular copy of Mr. North's report, and forty-two or forty-three pages are stricken out. Those pages are stereotyped. The plates are there in the Printing Office. They may not have been destroyed, but are they to be kept as a matter of ornament? They will be melted down for other plates. They are destroyed, in a legitimate sense of the word.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. A stereotyped plate, such as the Senator speaks of, costs perhaps $6, and if it is destroyed, it is a loss of $6. Would the Senator, rather than lose that $6, print 10,000 copies of a useless document?

Mr. HAWLEY. In the first place, that has nothing to do with what I was talking about; and in the second place, it is not a useless document. I was talking about the question of fact as to whether the plates had been destroyed or not; and even if there were only two plates——

Mr. CHANDLER. As a matter of fact the Senator knows that none have been destroyed. They are there.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know anything about it except what Mr. Wright now says, though I think it quite possible the plates have not been literally destroyed.

Mr. CHANDLER. They are there.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator has been there and looked at them, I take his word with Mr. Wright's as making it certain and putting it beyond doubt. But it is not a question whether the plates have been melted down. They have been stereotyped and they are there idle metal, and they are worth just 2 cents a pound as stereotype metal; that is all.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a word right in this connection?

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the Senator will take his own time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to say merely a word on this particular point.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not trying to delay the tariff debate or anything else.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know the Senator would not think of doing that, of course.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will, if necessary.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to speak a word right on this point. In reference to the Donaldson report, the Senator has alluded to the probabilities that 900 pages would be brought down to 600. That is a reduction of 300 pages, and at $6 a page makes $1,800. That does not come up to the Senator's declaration yesterday that there would be from $50,000 to $75,000 worth of plates thrown away if this condensation were made.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not say if this condensation were made. Let the Senator speak fairly. More of it was done elsewhere. But I do not care to go into that. I am not a cross-roads petty-fogging lawyer of that description; and I do not care to go into that sort of a contention.

Now, the new Administration came into power March 4, 1893, and though Mr. Porter was nominally at work there until July 31, he was not master of the situation at all. I will not say who was, but in my judgment he is a man not at all fit for it, under Mr. Hoke Smith. I think there was an unnecessary and an unjustifiable interference with the reports as they then stood.

So far as the value of the plates destroyed is concerned it is not a very great item, to be sure, but after you have paid $6 a page for composition and stereotyping—probably it would average something more than that, but no matter—after you have paid that, the cost of presswork, ink, and paper for a few thousand volumes could not be a very great deal for a document so valuable as this was. This is all I care to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on ordering the amendments to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being House bill 4864.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. QUAY addressed the Senate. After having spoken four hours—

Mr. COCKRELL said: The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he desires to proceed further?

Mr. QUAY. I do not. I shall resume my remarks, with the unanimous consent of the Senate, when the bill is next up for consideration, and give way to the Senator from Missouri.

[Mr. QUAY'S speech will be published entire after it shall have been concluded. See Appendix.]

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 31 minutes, p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 16, 1894, at 12 o'clock, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 14, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that as the Journal of the preceding day was under consideration when the House adjourned yesterday, and the yeas and nays had been ordered on the question of its approval, that is the first business to come before the House.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that the Speaker shall take the Chair and cause the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting to be read.

Mr. REED. But it has always been the custom in such cases to read first and dispose of the Journal of the preceding day.

The SPEAKER. Until the Journal of yesterday is read it does not appear that the preceding Journal has not been approved.

Mr. REED. But the House was dividing on the question of the approval of the Journal of the preceding day, and that question would come up before the question of the approval of yesterday's Journal. That has always been the custom. This Journal of yesterday can not intervene until the Journal of the preceding day has been approved.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read clause 1 of Rule I, which is very plain.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The Speaker shall take the Chair on every legislative day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned at the last sitting, immediately call the members to order, and, on the appearance of a quorum, cause the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting to be read, having previously examined and approved the same.

The SPEAKER. The Journal which the Chair is to cause to be read is the Journal of the proceedings of "the last day's sitting," which is the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. REED. That is upon the assumption that the preceding Journal has been approved. I think if the Chair will examine the precedents he will find that it has been the invariable practice to proceed in the way I have suggested, to close up the matter of approving the Journal of the preceding day and then take up the next one; and the House was dividing on that question yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how that rule could obtain, and does not know of any such precedent.

Mr. BYNUM. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that before the House can know the condition of yesterday's proceedings the Journal of those proceedings must be read. The very object of reading the Journal is to show what the pending question is. It does not follow that the Journal of the preceding day must, because it is the pending question, be approved before the Journal of yesterday, but in order that the proceedings of the day previous shall come before the House, the Journal of yesterday's proceedings must be read and approved. That is the very purpose of the rule which the Chair has just caused to be read, and I do not see how there can be any question about it.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to prolong the discussion of this question, but I would like to say, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, that the record of the action of the House is not kept specially for the information of the House: that the House takes cognizance of its own action and of the condition of its own business from the knowledge of its officers and not from the Journal, whether approved or not approved. The officers of the House know the condition the public business is in, and as a matter of course they must take cognizance of it; and the Journal of the day before yesterday not having been yet approved, it would seem as if that should be the first question to come before the House.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that the orderly way would be, in accordance with the rule, to read first the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday. That Journal discloses the fact that on yesterday a motion was made to approve the Journal of the preceding day, and that no action was taken upon it for want of a quorum. Of course, action must be taken subsequently upon the pending motion to approve the Journal of the day before yesterday, but it seems to the Chair that the Journal which is to be read on any meeting of the House must, in the nature of the case under the rule, be the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's session. The Chair will therefore cause that Journal to be read.

The Clerk accordingly read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Journal as read will be approved.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] objects to the approval of the Journal. As many as are in favor of approving the Journal will rise and stand until counted. [After a pause.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. A division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes none.

Mr. BOUTELLE. No quorum.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 0, not voting 211; as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 16, 1894.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O, eternal God, with bowed hearts we come to the foot of Thy throne. While the funeral knell sounds through the Capitol announcing the death of another Senator, while North Carolina mourns the departure from earth of a beloved and honored son and the nation feels the loss, we bless Thee for his large native powers schooled in the wide experience of public affairs, and for his genial humor, enriching and illumining all subjects he touched, making him kindly with his kind, by virtue of which he shed the influence of a wise and beneficent counsel and character upon his native State and, by virtue of his place in this Chamber upon the land at large.

Grant to the widow and children under this sore bereavement the only comfort which can come to human hearts at such a time—unshaken faith in Thy holy Gospel and the consolation and sympathy of Thy beloved Son. As the earthly part of one of our brothers has ended upon the border of the invisible world, grant that we hear from Thy lips, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors." We humbly pray, through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR VANCE.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, it is my melancholy duty to announce to the Senate the death of Hon. Zebulon Baird Vance, late a Senator from North Carolina. He died on Saturday night last, at forty-five minutes past 10, at his residence on Massachusetts avenue, in this city. Though his long-continued and serious illness ought to have prepared all of us for the sad event, still, beguiled by his own cheerful and hopeful spirit, none of us had dreamed that the white horses were coming so rapidly to his door.

His death shocks us to the depths of our hearts. It is a calamity, a sorrow, a deep public and personal bereavement. A great man has fallen in our midst; a great patriot, a great statesman, a great thinker, a great actor has passed away from our sight for this life.

He died at his post of duty with his complete armor on, with his face to the front, courageous, hopeful, useful to the last. Sufferings did not break his proud spirit, nor dim his noble intellect, nor shake his fearless fortitude. Full of years, but still in the strength of his eminent faculties, crowned with exalted honors, but still animated with yet higher aspirations and promise of doing good, physically wrecked and overcome with incurable malady, he stood firmly in the line of his comrades and at the last moment serenely gathered his robes around him and stepped with the dignity of a Senator and the faith of a Christian from earth into eternity. It looks as if by some prophetic intuition he had returned from the spring flowers and the genial skies of Florida to lay down his sword and shield on the very altars of his country.

This is not the time for the analysis of his character; for eulogies of his virtues; for the history of his illustrious services. On some fitting day I shall ask the Senate to do justice to his honored memory.

But, sir, I should commit a very great wrong not to say now with what unspeakable pain and infinite grief the death of Senator Vance smites the people of North Carolina. For more than forty years, in peace and in war, he has been the most beloved and the most honored son of that great State. From the overflowing ocean, across the hills and plains and valleys to the majestic mountain tops, he was a familiar and most dear object to the hearts and homes of all our people. Language can not describe the admiration and love and gratitude of those of all ages of both sexes; of every class, condition, and race: of the whole people of North Carolina, for this great and good man, their benefactor and bulwark in prosperity and adversity. Standing by his lifeless form to-day it is my sacred duty, representing a Commonwealth of nearly 2,000,000 souls, to shed upon his mortal ashes the tears of their affection and deepest sorrow.

He seemed, sir, as if by destiny to hold in his hands the hearts of the people, and at this moment the throbbing breasts of thousands are following his silent march to the tomb. If he had faults, they were bold, brave, open faults, and are forever eclipsed and forgotten in the splendor of a great and glorious life and in the magnanimity of a noble nature.

As I think of the short interval at which he follows the beloved Georgian from the folding doors of this Chamber to their last rest it looks as if two tall oaks which stood over and shaded our hearthstones had fallen in the early evening after the storm and heat of the day had passed over, and before the shades of night and winter had fallen upon their autumnal leaves. Colquitt and Vance had done their duty to their country and their fellow-men.

But I must not trust myself further. At the hour of 9 to-night the committees of the two Houses of Congress, the entire delegation of the State of North Carolina, and the special committee from the State, with the sad family and friends, will leave the capital of the Star Spangled Republic, and bear the remains of Governor Vance through the sister State of Virginia to the beautiful capital of North Carolina, and thence take them to his burying-ground on the mountain side, overlooking the blue torrents of the French Broad and in sight of lovely Asheville, and there leave them in the shade of the evergreens and in the mirror and melody of flowing waters, to sleep with his patriotic fathers. And as the clouds at evening hang upon the bosom and eternal towers of Black Mountain, so will a shadow of sorrow rest upon the bosom of all his people. But the light of his life with the early rays of morning will dispel the gloom from the mountains and from their hearts.

And now, I can only venture, in the name of the stricken Senate, with gentlest sympathy to send to the noble and devoted woman who for months, by day and night, with unwearied vigilance, has stood by him like an angel of light and love, our heartfelt condolence and tenderness, and to hold up to his brave sons the ever-living beacon of their father's life. He expired solaced in the arms and affections of his wife and children. And may our Almighty Father, in His supreme and infinite goodness, bestow upon them His strength and comfort.

Mr. President, I beg leave to ask consideration by the Senate of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

They were soon followed by the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Diplomatic Corps, and the President and his Cabinet ministers, who were respectively escorted to the seats assigned them on the floor of the Senate Chamber.

The casket containing the remains of the deceased Senator was brought into the Senate Chamber, preceded by Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., the Chaplain of the Senate, and Rev. MOSES D. HOGE, D. D., of Richmond, Va., and escorted by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, the committees of arrangements of the two Houses, the honorary pallbearers of the Senate and House, and pallbearers selected from the Capitol police, and followed by the members of the family and friends of the deceased.

Rev. MOSES D. HOGE, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Oh God, most high, most holy, most merciful, with lowly reverence of spirit and hearts subdued by the hallowed memories of the departed and by the tender offices of the hour, we invoke Thy gracious presence, help, and benediction.

Hear our prayer, O Lord: give ear unto our cry; hold not Thy peace at our tears, for we are strangers with Thee and sojourners, as all our fathers were.

Father of mercies, ever assuring Thy chastened children of Thine unchanging love, be very near to us now in this the hour of our sorrow, as we come to cast our care upon Thee and to seek the strength and consolation Thou only canst impart.

As a father pities his children, so do Thou pity us; as one whom his mother comforteth, so do Thou comfort us, and so sanctify our deepest distress that, being made partaker of Thy holiness, we may be prepared for everlasting blessedness in the world where, after the separations of time, we may find our true home; where all who have departed in Christ await our coming, beyond the reach of sorrow and tears, in the realm of eternal light and gladness.

Hear us, we beseech Thee, for the sake of Thy well-beloved Son, to whom, with Thee, O Father, and the Holy Spirit, we will give honor and glory forever. Amen.

After reading the ninetieth Psalm and the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians, Rev. Dr. HOGE delivered the following address:

The shadow of a great sorrow has fallen on this Chamber. The bloom and fragrance of spring, the sun shining bright and clear, bring no delight to our eyes, no cheer to our hearts. What are all the aspects of this vernal season, what even the great subjects that absorb and agitate us in daily life at this moment, when we see around us the badges of mourning, the tears of the bereaved, and when we look upon that bier and remember who lies upon it.

In the discharge of the mournful office assigned to me, it is not my province to awaken those tender regrets which the recital of the personal virtues and public services of your late associate must ever excite. This grateful duty will be performed by those who are best qualified for it by long acquaintance and intimate association.

These tributes to his memory when completed will not only form a permanent part of his personal history, but an addition to the history of the State he represented and served so well. Nor can I speak of that genial spirit—oftentimes jubilant—which made him such a favorite with the people, nor of other attractive qualities of mind and heart which converted acquaintances into friends, and which now, to be enjoyed no more, converts friends into mourners.

The only theme on which it is becoming in me to dwell takes us to a higher plane, and I could preface what I wish to say by the declaration that the first requisite to the highest and most symmetrical development of what is noblest in man, be he soldier, sage, or Senator, is sincere, consistent, heartfelt piety. There are indeed mere natural virtues which command respect and admiration, but after all "a Christian is the highest style of man."

Piety toward God is the surest incentive to the full discharge of all duties toward man, the truest and most unfailing inspiration of honor, the strongest safeguard of personal integrity, the most efficient aid in the pursuit and attainment of whatsoever things are just and true and lovely and of good report. The man who ever lives as under "the great Taskmaster's eye," who believes and remembers that God is now the witness of his conduct and to be his final judge, and who in all his acts, personal and official, strives to maintain a conscience void of offense, is the man who above all others will be most fearless in meeting every responsibility and most faithful in discharging every trust. This is the spirit which elevates its possessor above all that is ignoble, narrow, and selfish, because all the ends he aims at will be those of "country, God, and truth." How true this picture is of our lamented brother and friend let your hearts attest.

And now, remembering on whom the bereavement falls with heaviest weight, what can we do but take her in the arms of our faith, sympathy, and Christian affection, and commit her to the care and love of our Father in Heaven—to the protection and sustaining grace of our Elder Brother, whose hand alone is soft enough to wipe away the tears of bereavement and tender enough to bind up the bleeding heart. May God comfort His handmaiden, and all dear to her, and be their strength, song, and salvation.

To-day the voice of Providence unites with the voice of inspiration in admonishing us that all the glory of man is as the flower of the grass.

We are told that Massillon, about to deliver one of his wonderful funeral orations, found himself in a church surrounded with all the pomp and pageantry of the court. The church was not only hung with black drapery, but the light of day was excluded, and only a few dim tapers burned on the altar.

The beauty and chivalry of the land were there. The King was clothed in sackcloth and bowed with grief. There was silence; a solemn hush pervading the assembly. Massillon arose. His hands were folded on his breast; his eyes were lifted toward Heaven. He stood mute and abstracted. Presently his fixed look was unbent; his eye roved over the scene where every pomp was displayed, where every emblem of rank and power was exhibited. The eye could find no resting place amidst all this parade and histrionic mourning. At length it settled on the bier on which lay dead royalty covered with a pall. A sense of the indescribable nothingness of man at his best estate overcame the preacher, until in a scarce audible voice he startled the deep silence with the words: "There is nothing great but God!"

To-day this Senate Chamber, by a solemn dispensation, is converted into a "lodge of sorrow," and here, in an audience containing those who occupy the highest posts of influence and power in this land, all temporal distinctions for the moment seem to be forgotten as well as all the questions of absorbing interest which agitate the public mind, and in the presence of the dead—in the presence of the Great Judge of quick and dead—one pathetic utterance alone arrests our attention: "Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not." Once more are we warned that pallid Death, with impartial hand, knocks at all doors; he enters, with equal freedom the homes of the humble and the gates of the Capitol; he casts his chilling shadow over the lowly hovel and the halls of national legislation; he strips off the rags of the pauper and the robes of the Senator; and so to-day pride, ambition, vainglory, and the strifes and animosities of the hour veil their faces, and eternal things alone seem worthy of supreme regard. Once more we hear the voice coming out of the bygone century: "There is nothing great but God."

If by the mournful providence which has summoned us here we are taught more impressively than ever the evanescence of all earthly good; if we are possessed afresh with the conviction that "he builds too low who builds beneath the skies;" if we are led to the cross, where the defenseless find shelter and the guilty find pardon; if through the grace which fortifies the soul against the dread of death we gain preparation for the duties of life; if we address ourselves with new resolution to the discharge of those duties, with minds chastened and hearts purified by affliction, then this sad providence will have accomplished its salutary purpose.

The heart that so lately throbbed with patriotic ardor is still. The lips that so lately moved in prayer for God's blessing on country, church, and home, are mute; but be it ours to keep alive the sacred flame and to prolong the prayer that Heaven's best benediction may rest on this confederated empire of imperial States; on its Chief Magistrate and all associated with him in the responsibilities of office; upon the houses of State and national legislation; upon all our citizens in their homes; upon all the people of this great land from North to South and from East to West, that all may learn more and more to cherish the relations which unite them as children of one Father and as citizens of one country; that freedom founded on justice and guarded by constitutional law, with religion pure and undefiled permeating all, may secure to us a perpetual heritage of harmony, prosperity, and peace; and to God, most high, will we ascribe, as is most due, all honor and glory evermore. Amen.

And now, as the closing exercise in this service, I will read the following hymn:

THY WILL BE DONE.

My God and Father, while I stray
Far from my home, on life's rough way,
O teach me from my heart to say,
Thy will be done!

Let but my fainting heart be blest
With Thy sweet Spirit for its guest,
My God, to Thee I leave the rest;
Thy will be done!

Renew my will from day to day;
Blend it with Thine; and take away
All that now makes it hard to say,
Thy will be done!

Then, when on earth I breathe no more
The prayer, oft mixed with tears before,
I'll sing upon a happier shore,
Thy will be done!

The benediction was pronounced by the Chaplain of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee of arrangements, conducted by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, will escort the remains of the deceased Senator from the Chamber to the depot of the Richmond and Danville Railroad, and from thence to the place of burial in the State of North Carolina; and after they have left the Chamber the guests of the Senate will depart in the reverse order of their entrance.

The casket was borne from the Chamber, attended by the Sergeant-at-Arms, the honorary pallbearers, the committee of arrangements, and the family of the deceased Senator.

The invited guests having retired from the Chamber,

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of my deceased colleague, I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 17, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 16, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. The Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY, offered the following prayer:

O, Thou Great Disposer of all human events, with Whom are the issues of life and death, bow down Thine ear and hear our supplications. We bring to Thee our hearts, tender with sympathy for the sorrows of those who mourn. How often of late, O Lord, have our ranks been broken, and men in high places of authority and dear to the hearts of the people have been called hence to give an account of their stewardship; and Death, with equal footstep, is knocking at the palace of the rich and the humble cot of the poor; and so Thou art teaching us the shortness and uncertainty of human life. May we fix our affections upon things above and not upon things on the earth; and as our bodies are frail and as our days are few, may we live as if there were but a step between us and death. And when the end comes, O Lord, may we lie down in peace to sleep, and upon the morning of the resurrection may we awake in the light of Thy love and the joy of Thy presence and live with Thee forever, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal as read will be approved.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, one moment, please. If there be no objection, I would be glad to have the question of the approval of the Journal deferred until to-morrow morning, as I desire to ask attention to the decision of the Chair made last week in reference to the Journal of Thursday last; which decision I think the Chair, on reflection, will be inclined to reverse, as to the order of business. I think the first business in order this morning would be the approval of the Journal of last Thursday, and believe that an examination of the precedents, to which I will ask the attention of the Chair at the proper time, will show this beyond question—the yeas and nays having been ordered on the demand for the previous question on the approval of the Journal. But under the circumstances, which are familiar to all, I do not care this morning to raise that question, and simply ask that it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan inasmuch, as there certainly can not be any objection to the approval of the Journal of Saturday's proceedings, that it be now approved.

Mr. BURROWS. In view of the fact that the regular order of business, after the House is called to order this morning and the Journal has been read, would be the approval of the Journal of last Thursday's proceedings, the proper time to raise that question would be now. It is a question that I desire to discuss for a little while; but, as I have said, under the circumstances known to the House, I suggest that it be deferred for the present, and be allowed to lie over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. COOMBS. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to ask consent to offer a resolution——

The SPEAKER. Any agreement of the sort to which the gentleman from Michigan refers would bring this Journal up for consideration to-morrow morning. The Chair thinks that the Journal of the proceedings of to-day would come up to-morrow.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Michigan objects to the approval of the Journal, I suggest that the approval of the Journals of to-day and Saturday go over until to-morrow, and by consent we take up executive business for consideration.

Mr. BURROWS. I would have no objection to that. I ask that the question of the approval of the Journal rest until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the question of the approval of the Journal of Saturday's proceedings be allowed to go over until to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MALLORY. I object.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Journal as read will be approved.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROWN, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. EVERETT, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. ALLEN, indefinitely, on account of serious illness of his wife.

To Mr. HUDSON, for to-day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. PAGE, for one week, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, for one day, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. CHICKERING, for one week, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. HOOKER of New York, indefinitely, on account of personal sickness and sickness in his family.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that as soon as the resolutions come over from the Senate in relation to the death of Senator Vance I will ask the House to proceed at once to their consideration.

I ask unanimous consent now that we take a recess for twenty minutes.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will withdraw that motion for a moment, so that I may be permitted to present a resolution for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has intimated to gentlemen that no business would be transacted this morning.

DEATH OF GEN. SLOCUM.

Mr. COOMBS. I should like consent at this time to offer a resolution in relation to the death of a former member of this body and a distinguished citizen of New York. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read subject to objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas we have heard with profound regret of the death of a former and distinguished member of this body, Maj. Gen. Henry W. Slocum, who died at Brooklyn on the morning of the 14th instant:

Resolved, That in this death of one of the great captains of the Union Army during the late war the country has lost a brave and skillful soldier, a wise legislator, and a pure citizen of high and dignified character; and

Resolved, That this preamble and resolution be spread upon the Journal of the House, and that a copy of them be sent to his sorrowing family.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I now renew my request. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess for twenty minutes, while waiting for the action of the Senate in relation to the death of a member of that body.

There being no objection, the House at 12 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m. took a recess for 20 minutes.

The recess having expired, the House, at 12 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m., resumed its session.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution (H. Res. 139) to print the Agricultural Report for 1893.

DEATH OF SENATOR VANCE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with great sorrow of the death of the Hon. Zebulon B. Vance, late a Senator from the State of North Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of nine Senators be appointed by the Vice-President to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. Vance, which will take place to-day in the Senate Chamber, at 4 o'clock p. m., and that the Senate will attend the same.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect entertained by the Senate for his memory, his remains be removed from Washington to North Carolina in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives, and invite the House of Representatives to attend the funeral to-day, Monday, at 4 o'clock p. m., and to appoint a committee to act with the committee of the Senate.

The message also announced that, in compliance with the foregoing, the Vice-President had appointed as said committee Mr. RANSOM, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. GRAY, Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. COKE, Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. DUBOIS, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. MANDERSON

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions of the Senate.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as set forth in the above message.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. Zebulon Baird Vance, late a Senator from the State of North Carolina.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House appoint a committee of nine members, to act in conjunction with the committee appointed by the Senate, to make the necessary arrangements and to accompany the remains to the place of burial.

Resolved, That the House accept the invitation of the Senate to attend the funeral this afternoon at 4 o'clock.

Resolved, That a recess be now taken until 3:45 p. m., at which hour the House will proceed in a body to the Senate Chamber to attend the funeral, and at the conclusion thereof, on return to its Chamber, the Speaker, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, shall declare the House adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House notify the Senate of the action of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, Zebulon Baird Vance, having finished his course on earth, now rests from his labors in a better world. After having done much good in his generation, he has been gathered unto his fathers, and his lot will no longer be cast in this vale of misery and tears.

Mr. Speaker, Zebulon Baird Vance was a very great man, and was exceedingly beloved by the people of North Carolina, and the whole State, now in mourning for him, will long deeply and sincerely lament his loss.

This is not the time, however, for commemorating the virtues and services of the departed. At some time in the future the House will be asked to set apart a day on which the friends of the deceased may pay proper tribute to his individual worth and to his long, faithful, and distinguished public services. On this solemn and mournful occasion my heart overflows with kindly feeling and tenderness for his bereaved widow and children and for all who are near and dear to them. They are indeed desolate and oppressed. In this sad hour of their trial and affliction they have the comforting and heartfelt sympathy, not only of the people of North Carolina, but of all the Union.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolutions which have been read.

The resolutions were agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina, Mr. BLACK of Illinois, Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. BROOKSHIRE, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. DANIELS, Mr. STRONG, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. HOUK.

And then, in accordance with the terms of the resolutions, the House took a recess until 3:45 o'clock p. m.

The recess having expired, the House, at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., resumed its session.

The SPEAKER. The House will now attend the funeral of the late Senator Vance in the Senate Chamber.

The House then proceeded in a body to the Senate Chamber. At the conclusion of the funeral ceremonies the House returned.

In accordance with the resolutions, and as a further mark of respect to the dead Senator, the SPEAKER (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) declared the House adjourned.

White and 15 other citizens of Cambridgeport, Mass., praying that fraternal society and college journals be admitted to the mails as second-class matter; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CULLOM. I present petitions of a large number of firms and individuals, citizens of Chicago, Ill., the substance of which I can state as briefly as can possibly be done by quoting from the petition itself.

The petitioners ask—

First. That all rates of railway transportation shall be stable, steady, and equitable between competing corporations and competing places, and subject to prompt supervision by proper authorities, with the ultimate decision in the United States court.

Second. That the railroad corporations shall be properly restrained from extorting or using unjust discrimination.

Third. To insure the above, we believe that railroads should be allowed to make agreements with each other that shall be binding in law.

Fourth. That all fines and punishments for violations of the interstate commerce law by railroad companies shall apply to the corporations themselves and not to the employés as individuals.

The petitioners then proceed to state that they care nothing for the form, but ask that the principles embodied in their petition be enacted into law. These petitions are signed by, I think, three or four hundred business firms of Chicago, Ill. The first name on the petition which I hold in my hand is that of Franklin MacVeagh & Co. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS ON CHINESE TREATY.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that any petition or memorial relating to the proposed treaty with China may be presented in open session. The substance of that treaty has been made public by order of the Senate. This course will, I think, be more convenient, and it is desirable that the petitioners should know that their petitions reached us.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR presented the memorial of William H. Cook, president of the Tackmakers' Protective Society, of Whitman, Mass., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty with China; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented memorials of the Lake Seamen's Union, of Chicago, Ill.; of the Amalgamated Association of Street Railway Employés of America, of St. Paul, Minn.; of the American Federation of Labor, of New York, and of the Table Knife Grinders' National Union, of Northampton, Mass., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty with China; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I ask that the memorial may be received and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. PERKINS. I suggest that the memorials which have been presented remonstrating against the adoption of the Chinese treaty should be laid upon the table, instead of being referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

TEXAS JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. COKE. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1134] to create the southern judicial district of the State of Texas, to fix the times and places of holding courts in said district and in the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, to report it with amendments, and to ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 1, line 8, after the word "Madison" to insert "Houston."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 11, after the word "Gonzales," to strike out "Dewitt."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 1, after the word "that," to insert "hereafter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 3, after the word "Madison," to insert "Houston."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 6, after the word "Gonzales," to strike out "Dewitt."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 11, after the word "process," to insert "hereafter."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the passage of the bill, because I take it it has received (as all bills of this character do receive) the careful scrutiny of the Committee on the Judiciary. But I should like the Senator from Texas to give me some information concerning the State of Texas and the necessity that there may be for adding another judicial district. I make this inquiry from the fact that many of the Western States of large area, of course not comparing with the State of Texas in extent of territory, compose single districts. For instance, the State of Nebraska, with an area of 75,000 square miles, has for many years sought to have that which I think is needed, a division of the State into two judicial districts, but it has knocked at the doors of the Committee on the Judiciary in vain. I should like to have the Senator from Texas state the necessity for an additional district and the number of judicial districts that now exist in Texas.

Mr. COKE. There are now existing in the State of Texas three judicial districts, the eastern, western, and northern. The district that is now proposed to be created embraces the southern portion of the State. It contains some 52 counties. We have been so pressed in that State for judicial service that a judge from an adjoining State has repeatedly had to hold court at Galveston and Paris. The bar of the State have for a long time been petitioning for the creation of another judicial district so that the business of the State can be transacted. There are three judicial districts in Texas now. The State of Texas is of sufficient area for five States the size of Virginia or Pennsylvania. Great distances have to be traversed by litigants, witnesses, and officers, as the judicial districts are now arranged, and an additional district is absolutely necessary for the convenience of the people.

Mr. MANDERSON. What was the population of the State at the last census?

Mr. COKE. The population of the State at the last census was in the neighborhood of 2,500,000, but it is supposed now to be nearly 3,500,000. Immigration has poured very rapidly into the State, and the people need these judicial conveniences for carrying on business.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no question of the need or necessity that is described by the Senator from Texas. This bill will give to that State four judicial districts, and I presume from the enormous area and the population—population being some index to the amount of litigation in all cases—the bill probably should pass. But I hope that when Western States shall make their application for similar favor, if it is to be put under the head of favor, such bills may be considered, as they have not been in the past.

Take the State that I have the honor in part to represent, with its 75,000 square miles of territory and a population now approaching 1,500,000. It has no more judicial opportunities than it had when it was admitted into the Union. I had surrendered at discretion, but I shall again introduce a bill to form two judicial districts in the State of Nebraska, and I shall commend it to the careful attention, and I hope the favorable consideration, of the members of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be permitted to make one observation, without violating the proprieties which are due to the committee——

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts never does that.

Mr. HOAR. My impression is (the Senator from Texas will correct me if I am wrong) that the next business in the Judiciary Committee after this Texas bill was the consideration of a bill for the accommodation of the State of Nebraska, not, however, it is true, making a new judicial district, but multiplying the number of courts. I have no doubt, speaking for one alone, but I think I am quite correct, that any measure for increased judicial facilities of the United States courts in Nebraska which had the assent of its representatives here, or, if there were division among them, which had the assent of its senior Senator alone, would be favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. COKE. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that I think the bill to which he refers will be favorably reported to-day.

Mr. MANDERSON. That, however, is not the measure which is desired. That is a bill which proposes to increase the burdens already upon the judge of that district, which, owing to the amount of work and the many terms of court held, are said by the judge to be such that he can not in justice to himself fulfill the the duties required. The bill to which I refer and which I shall again introduce is a bill akin to the one pending, and proposes to make of that great State two judicial districts with two judges. I shall not attempt to hamper the pending bill by placing anything in the form of an amendment upon it to reach this evil, but I shall certainly reintroduce that bill after we have entered again upon the process of making more judicial districts.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the Senator from Nebraska understood the sotto voce observation of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], which was not a suggestion that he should introduce it as an amendment to the pending bill, but to the bill which is soon to be reported proposing to make new terms of court in Nebraska.

Mr. HALE. No; let me state my thought. Submitting, of course, to the knowledge of the locality possessed by the Senator from Nebraska, my thought was that as he made so good a case in favor of Nebraska, the probabilities were that the Committee on the Judiciary had been so busily engaged in this matter in regard to Texas that they had forgotten Nebraska, and that therefore it would be an exceedingly good thing to move that as an amendment to the bill reported by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Maine will pardon me. The next bill to be reported, I understand, or at any rate it was the next bill taken up in the committee, is a bill for Nebraska.

Mr. HALE. But that is not such a bill as the Senator from Nebraska wants.

Mr. HOAR. I understand; but the Senator's observation is that the committee had forgotten Nebraska. The truth is the bill which the committee have agreed to report is the bill which the Representatives from Nebraska and one of its Senators favor. The Senator from Nebraska says that that bill increases the burdens of the judge. Suppose it does; it is the judge's business to carry all the burdens that he properly and fairly ought to carry whether the burdens are less or more.

Mr. MANDERSON. Would not that apply to the three judges in Texas whose judicial districts are already in existence?

Mr. HOAR. No; because that vast space requires another judge. If it be true, as the Senator from Nebraska suggests, that making new terms of court for Nebraska is not sufficient, and that there ought to be a new district with another judge, and clerk, and marshal, and so on, and additional places of holding court, that would seem to be a legitimate amendment to the bill about Nebraska, which is to come in, and not to the Texas bill. That is what I supposed my friend from Maine would agree to, if he had known that that bill was to come up soon.

Mr. HALE. I had heard all the colloquy and thought I knew not only the condition of the bill, but what my own suggestion was. I was lugged into the debate by the Senator from Massachusetts assuming that in addition to all his knowledge of the bill he knew what I thought when I with some modesty ventured to make a remark, which I rather regret.

Mr. HOAR. If my friend will pardon me, it was not assuming to know what he thought, but it was an understanding or misunderstanding of what he said; that is all. I did not undertake to say what he thought. I said I thought he said something.

Mr. HALE. That is all very natural. The Senator was so vehement about it afterwards that I began to think I myself was mistaken about what I did intend. As this bill proposes to make an additional judge in one State and deals with the general question of the judiciary of the United States by adding a judge, I thought it would be a very fitting thing, as the case disclosed the necessity, that we should add another judge in Nebraska. While the Senator from Texas shakes his head at that, and thinks it is heresy, I still think it would not be a very inopportune thing for the Senator from Nebraska (who has had large experience in this body and who is able to get upon his feet and make known his wants, as some of us are not), to move an amendment to the bill that an added judge should be given in Nebraska. Then the two measures would go along, and the need of one is as great as that of the other. They do not interfere whatever. If in addition to that this other little bill, which does not seem to be of any account, adding to the duties of the judge, comes in, it can be disposed of at once. But I still insist that there was nothing very heretical about my idea that Nebraska should be added to Texas.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Maine is never heretical; indeed I sometimes think he is nonheretical in the attitude which he takes about some matters that come up here; but I should for one myself oppose introducing the policy of logrolling court bills. So far as I know and remember they are always kept separate. The wants of each State depend upon the consideration due to that State; and the Senate is always ready and apt on the request of the Senators from a State to create new judicial districts. Although the Senator from Nebraska thinks there is one case that occurred in regard to this very State of Nebraska, I do not now remember an instance where the Senators and Representatives of any State in the Union agreed in their desire that there should be a new judicial district created in the State that it was denied by the committee. Once or twice where there have been two or three new ones sought, the committee have diminished the number of those asked for, not the number existing; but I do not remember any instance where the request to increase the number was denied. I am very sure if the Senators and Representatives from the State of Nebraska, who know its wants, will ask for a new judicial district they will get it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I suppose it would be a great deal better if there is to be any logrolling—and I am glad the Senator from Massachusetts has never observed any here and has never participated in anything of the kind—but if there is to be any logrolling it ought to be done in committee; there is no doubt about that; and it ought not to be brought into the Senate, to become a subject of discussion, and thereby offend the sensitiveness of the Senator from Massachusetts or of any of us. The Committee on the Judiciary ought to take these things and make them up in committee, and they will find that even there the Senator from Massachusetts will oppose them; but they will be able to introduce logrolling bills here in the Senate, under the cover of committee reports, and nobody will ever know anything about the matter. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that to that extent it is better that they should be adjusted in committee rather than be brought into the Senate.

I am sorry, I will say to my friend from Nebraska, that, after being lugged into the debate by the Senator from Massachusetts, I made any suggestion. I now withdraw it, and leave this entire great subject to him.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be allowed, I will merely say to the Senator from Maine that I have been very much punished in having the whole matter thrown on my shoulders.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

Mr. MANDERSON. Only a word. I regret to interrupt this flow of compliment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Nebraska that the Chair had recognized the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. COKE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska, if he desires the floor.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply want to make a suggestion, and I know that the Senator from Texas will coincide with me in not desiring to interrupt this flow of compliment that is passing so freely between the two Senators from the effete East. There is no State in New England that needs, I think, any additional judges or judicial districts. The distances there are so short, that no judge, perhaps, is imposed upon by way of fatigue of travel or the expense thereof.

I merely desire to call attention to the condition which will result when this bill shall pass. The State of Texas, we will say, has 3,000,000 people. If it is divided into four judicial districts, that will be one judge to every 750,000 of population. The State of Nebraska has one judge to about a million and a half of people, and if there should be another judge accorded to that State, as I think there certainly should be, it would then be even with the State of Texas, having one judge to each three-quarters of a million of people, and the division of the territory would be about the same. If two judges should be awarded to Nebraska, then it would be about equal with the State of Texas with the four judges that will be provided for that State by the pending bill. I hope the Senator from Texas will be one of the Committee on the Judiciary to earnestly favor the bill for Nebraska when it is before the committee.

Mr. COKE. I will do everything that is right. The bill now before the Senate was considered by the Committee on the Judiciary and unanimously recommended, and I hope it will now be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAREY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1591) to provide for the reservation, sale, and settlement of certain lands in several of the States and Territories, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1620) for the suppression of lottery traffic through national and interstate commerce and the postal service, subject to the jurisdiction and laws of the United States, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I should like to have the bill put on its passage this morning; but it is an important bill, which, I suppose, Senators would like to see in print before voting upon it. I give notice that I shall ask at an early date that the bill be taken up and put on its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

LANDS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. MARTIN. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5065) to ratify the reservation of certain lands made for the benefit of Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment; and I ask the immediate consideration of the bill. It is a matter that ought not to take ten minutes to dispose of, and it is somewhat important to the people of Oklahoma. I should like to have it disposed of now.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. MARTIN. If there be no objection to the consideration of the bill, I should like to state briefly what it is about.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill has been called for, the Chair will state to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. That is a long and a very important bill, and I do not think we can consider it now. I think it had better go to the Calendar, so as to give us an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. MARTIN. I sincerely hope the Senator from Maine will withdraw his objection. I think, if he understood the bill, he would not make any objection to it.

The public lands in the Territory of Oklahoma are now governed and controlled by the Secretary of the Interior, and the law authorizes him to lease them. The whole sum and substance of the bill, which has the consent of the Secretary of the Interior and the indorsement of the Committee on Public Lands, is that the law be so amended as to authorize the governor and secretary of the Territory and the superintendent of the public schools for the time being to exercise the power to lease, instead of the Secretary of the Interior, until the meeting of the Legislature; and that then the whole matter shall be under the jurisdiction of the Territorial Legislature. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. HALE. I dislike to interfere with the personal desire of the Senator, but we have had a great deal of trouble by premature and unadvised legislation with reference to just such subjects as this. Where a matter of this importance is brought to the Senate upon the report of a committee, I do not think it unreasonable to insist upon the point that it go to the Calendar and be printed, and then we may have an opportunity of examining it. I can assure the Senator, so far as I am concerned, that when that opportunity has been had and all the provisions of the bill have been examined, I shall not object any day to taking the bill up and putting it upon its passage; but I have had no opportunity, nor has any other Senator outside of the committee, to look into this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the bill, and it will go to the Calendar.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] in relation to the employment of a stenographer for the Joint Committee on Naval Affairs, to report it favorably and without amendment. I ask for immediate action on the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. BUTLER February 2, 1894, as follows:

Resolved, That the joint committee from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the two Houses of Congress be, and hereby is, authorized to employ a stenographer, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Why should the Senate contingent fund be made the scapegoat for the expenses of a joint committee?

Mr. CAMDEN. I will state that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is the chairman of the joint committee, and I understand that whichever body is assigned the chairmanship of such a committee defrays the expenses that are to be paid.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to state that it was found necessary to raise a joint committee of the two Houses for the purpose of taking up very many subjects in respect of naval matters. We were troubled with a great many subjects in both the House of Representatives and the Senate regarding the personnel of the Navy and many other matters which required adjustment. A joint committee of the two Houses was appointed, and that committee meet in the Senate committee room, the members of the joint committee on the part of the House of Representatives meeting with the members of the committee on the part of the Senate. The expenses of a stenographer can not amount to a very large sum one way or the other, perhaps not over $50 or $100 at the outside. Therefore, in drawing up the resolution, it was not deemed necessary to separate the funds out of which the appropriation should be made. It is a matter of no material consequence, and will not be very costly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

TARIFF RATES.

Mr. VOORHEES. I make a report from the Committee on Finance, which I send to the desk, and I ask the Secretary to read the head lines, which will indicate the character of the work.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Changes in the Text and Rates of Duty of the Tariff Act of 1890 and of the Administrative Act of June, 1890, made by The Bill H. R. 4864.

As it passed the House, and also as reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee, together with statistics relating thereto and the rates of duty proposed by the Mills bill of 1888.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the document be printed for the use of the Senate under the customary rule.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Is it proposed to print the Mills bill entire with that document?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not know that it is. The document gives the rates of duties.

Mr. HILL. For one, I should like to have the Mills bill printed entire. I made that suggestion some time ago, as the Senator will recollect.

Mr. COCKRELL. It ought not to be printed with this document, but printed separately.

Mr. HILL. All right. Let it be printed one way or the other.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that an order be made for the printing of the document as it has been presented, and if afterwards it is found to be useful to have any further printing we can easily make the necessary order. This is a statement of the rates proposed by the Mills bill, and not a publication of the bill itself.

I ask for information—I confess I am not very well informed—as to the number of copies that will be published of the matter I have presented?

Mr. DOLPH. Nineteen hundred.

Mr. MANDERSON. The usual number.

Mr. DOLPH. But the Senate only gets 400 copies of that number.

Mr. MANDERSON. There will be 1,970 copies printed in all, but they are distributed under the law to many libraries and other recipients of such literature.

Mr. VOORHEES. How many to the Senate?

Mr. DOLPH. The Senate only gets about 400 copies.

Mr. MANDERSON. Only about 400 copies out of the 1,970.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the order be made according to the usual custom, and if hereafter it is found that the Senators need more, which I think very likely, we can increase the order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SETTLEMENT OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hold in my hand a copy of a joint report, to which I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. It is to this effect: A copy of the joint report from the Secretaries of the different Departments respecting the annual settlement of the public accounts. It bears date December 6, 1816, and is signed by James Monroe, William H. Crawford, George Graham, and B. W. Crowninshield.

The report discusses with a great deal of ability the question now before the Senate regarding a reorganization of the different Executive Departments. I think it will be of great interest to every Senator to see this report, and I ask that it be printed as a document for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire if the document from which the report presented by him is taken is referred to in the report?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it is referred to, but I will reëxamine it, and if it is not referred to, I will make such reference.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report ought to refer to the document from which it is taken, so that, if necessary, a comparison can be made with the original.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 1919) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Yuma Indians, in California, for the cession of their surplus lands, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 74) for the proper enrollment of Thomas R. Proctor in the Navy of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAREY (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 75) interpreting the act of March 2, 1889; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CAMERON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WHITE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO REVENUE BILL.

Mr. LODGE. I submit an amendment to House bill 4864, being the tariff bill, which at the proper time I shall propose to that bill. I ask that it be read and printed.

The amendment was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed, as follows:

Page 100, after line 11, insert the following as a new section, to be numbered section 3:

"When not in contravention of any existing treaty, any article made dutiable in the preceding sections shall, if it is the product or manufacture of Great Britain or of any of the colonies of Great Britain, pay a duty double that herein imposed; and, when not in contravention of any existing treaty, any article upon the free list in the preceding section shall, if the product or manufacture of Great Britain or of any of the colonies of Great Britain, pay a duty of 35 per cent ad valorem, except wool, which shall bear the rates of duty imposed by the tariff act of October 1, 1890; and such additional and discriminating duties upon the products or manufactures of Great Britain or her colonies shall remain in force until Great Britain shall assent to and take part in an international agreement together with the United States, for the coinage and use of silver; and whenever Great Britain shall assent to and take part in such international agreement for the coinage of silver, then the additional and discriminating duties herein imposed upon the products of Great Britain and her colonies shall cease."

RIVER AND HARBOR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the amount of appropriations made and expended by the Government for the improvement of rivers and harbors since the 1st day of January, 1865, to the present date, specifying the different rivers and harbors in which improvements have been made and the amounts expended therefor respectively.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to say to the Senator that up to within the last three or four years this information has been furnished, and is an official document, which can be found in the Senate document room.

Mr. ALLEN. If that be true, it would be very short work to have the information brought down to date.

Mr. DOLPH. What the resolution calls for would be a voluminous document and require a great deal of labor to prepare it; and I wished to give the Senator that information. Perhaps the resolution had better go over until to-morrow morning, and I will examine to see how far the information has been brought down; perhaps it will answer the Senator s purpose to have the information already published brought up to date.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to have the resolution considered.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well; I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the resolution go over, so that the matter may be investigated, and the Senator, if he wishes, may then modify his resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over under the rule.

TREATY WITH SPAIN OF 1819.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to institute negotiations with the Government of Spain for the decision by arbitration of the obligation of the United States under the treaty with Spain of 1819 to pay interest on the principal sum awarded for losses sustained by subjects of Spain and by inhabitants of the provinces of the East and West Floridas; also the question whether the treaty of 1819 has been carried into effect and performed by the United States in respect to the obligations assumed by them in the said treaty: Provided, That all sums of money allowed under such arbitration shall be paid only to the said claimants and their heirs or legal representatives, and that all powers of attorney to represent such claimants, their heirs and representatives, and all assignments of such claims or any part thereof shall be declared void and of no force or effect.

CONSIDERATION OF CHINESE TREATY.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present a resolution, which I send to the desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the pending Chinese treaty be considered in open session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that resolution had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon subsequently said: I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the resolution introduced by me this morning, to the effect that the Chinese treaty shall be considered in open session, do not go to the Calendar, but that it may lie on the table until the 3d of May.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TURPIE in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CASES.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate a list of all persons in office on April 10, 1894, in the Department of Justice, employed by the Government in the defense of Indian depredation cases brought under the act of March 3, 1891, to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations, giving the names of such employés, the salaries of each, the terms of their employment, whether regular or special, temporary or permanent, the nature of the services performed by them, and the places of their employment, whether in Washington or elsewhere; also when such employment commenced.

DISTRICT STREET RAILWAY TICKETS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 443) to provide for the sale of new tickets by the street railway companies of the District of Columbia.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were to strike out all of section 1, after the enacting clause, and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act each street railway and street herdic transportation company in the District of Columbia shall issue its own tickets, and sell no tickets issued by any other company. Such tickets shall be printed and sold in sheets of 6 tickets each, and after having been once used shall be canceled by the company which issued the same.

And in section 2, line 1, after the word "railway," insert "or street herdic transportation."

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the effect of the amendments? As I understand, if I caught the reading of the amendments aright, the object is to make the street car companies exchange tickets with the herdic company.

Mr. FAULKNER. No; that is exactly the amendment I wish to secure in conference. The House amended the bill so as to include the herdic company in the requirement, which does not now issue tickets, and I think that is a very proper amendment. I wish to have an additional amendment added, and I ask for a conference in order to facilitate the action on the measure in Congress. I wish to provide that these companies shall exchange also with the herdic company, because they will not exchange tickets with the herdic company unless required to do so by a provision of law

Mr. COCKRELL. I think they ought to be made to exchange tickets with the herdic company.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is exactly the object I propose to accomplish.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the herdic company issues tickets at six for a quarter, I wish to have them exchangeable at that rate.

Mr. HALE. Do not the street car companies exchange tickets now with the herdic company?

Mr. COCKRELL. They do not.

Mr. FAULKNER. They do not. The herdic company does not issue any tickets.

Mr. HALE. I had the impression that when we get tickets from the street car companies they are taken by the herdic company.

Mr. COCKRELL. Of course.

Mr. FAULKNER. The herdic company does take them, but it does not issue any, and if it did——

Mr. COCKRELL. The railroad companies would not take them.

Mr. FAULKNER. They would not take them. There is no exchange of tickets between the herdic company and the street car lines. That is the information we have; and we wish to have a provision put in the law that the street railways shall be required to exchange with the herdic company.

Mr. HALE. That is the object of the conference?

Mr. FAULKNER. That is the object of the conference.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that what he proposes is in the nature of a new provision, and it seems to me it would be more appropriate to agree to that amendment of the House of Representatives, with an amendment securing what he proposes to provide for. Otherwise the other House will meet the Senate conferees by saying, "This is new matter, which has not been considered in either House, and therefore it is not competent for the conference committee to deal with it." It seems to me, if the Senator has that object in view, the best way is to let the bill lie over; prepare the amendment, and then call up the bill and have the amendment made here in the first instance.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am willing to pursue whatever course will best facilitate the passage of the bill, but I supposed that as the other House had inserted an amendment as to the herdic company, we certainly had a right to add in conference as an amendment that the tickets required to be issued by the herdic company should also be exchanged by the street car companies. I think the amendment would be perfectly germane to the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALLISON. It may be germane, but why should we not deal with it here?

Mr. FAULKNER. If there is no objection, I will withdraw my motion and ask that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill and amendments will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CONSIDERATION OF THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the unanimous-consent agreement under which the Senate acted during the past week expired yesterday by its own terms. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and I, recognizing the fact that it would expire at that time, have conferred with respect to the matter, and he and I have agreed to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that for the present week and until this day a week, Tuesday next, the agreement of last week be continued; that is, that the Senate meet at 12 o'clock, take up the tariff bill promptly at 1 o'clock, and proceed with its consideration until 5 o'clock without interruption; and on Tuesday next, at 5 o'clock, what is called general debate shall cease, and the bill after that shall be taken up and read paragraph by paragraph for amendment, the committee amendments being first dealt with as reached in the reading of the bill.

I desire, however, to reserve, after what is called general debate under this agreement shall have been concluded, that one Senator on this side of the Chamber shall be heard in the nature of general debate, making such reply as he may choose to make to the speeches that have gone before.

Mr. MANDERSON. Does the last suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee mean that when we come to debate the items of the bill paragraph by paragraph what he is pleased to call general debate shall not be had?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think there would be no objection on this side of the Chamber to an understanding that either on Tuesday or Wednesday some Senator representing the committee or representing the friends of the bill shall have two hours, or whatever time he pleases, for the discussion of the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. Two weeks, if he desires it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Two weeks, as the Senator from Nebraska suggests, if he desires it. But of course that agreement does not imply that other Senators shall not have a right to speak at any time as long as they please upon the bill or any of its amendments.

Mr. HARRIS. The agreement which I seek, and which I think the Senator from Rhode Island agrees with me about is, that when the time fixed by the consent agreement for general debate shall have expired the reading of the bill by paragraphs shall begin.

Mr. ALDRICH. The only objection which I should make to the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee would be more in the way of criticism of the phrase used, "general debate," than of the intent of the agreement. I agree with him perfectly as to that; but whether it shall be called "general debate," or whether it shall be called by some other name, is a matter about which there might be some difference of opinion. I suppose the Senator from Tennessee understands as well as I do that general debate in the Senate, in one sense, does not close until the third reading of a bill is ordered, and that even after the consideration of the bill by paragraphs commences any Senator can address the Senate at any length he pleases, or upon any subject he pleases, connected with the tariff.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a mere play upon words, if there be a difference at all between the Senator from Rhode Island and me. The object I have in view is to reach the earliest day possible to begin to read the bill and dispose of it. Of course under the rules debate upon amendments is as unlimited as the debate upon the bill. There can be no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is all.

Mr. HARRIS. But I wish to reach the point where we begin to read the bill and consider it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Now, let us understand it. On Wednesday, say, at 1 o'clock or 2 o'clock, whatever time may be chosen, the reading of the bill by paragraphs, for amendment, will be commenced.

Mr. HARRIS. And on Tuesday next a Senator upon this side of the Chamber shall have such time as he may desire, not exceeding two and a half or three hours; perhaps two hours will be as much as will be wanted.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not interpose an objection to what I regard as the material part of this agreement, which I understand to be that on next Wednesday, by unanimous consent, if that be the day, the reading of the bill shall commence by paragraphs, and that what is known as the formal reading, passing through the entire bill, shall be dispensed with. I suppose that is the object the Senator from Tennessee has in view.

The idea of closing general debate, as suggested by the Senator, of course, is an inadmissible idea in this body. No such suggestion has ever been made or thought of heretofore. The bill is open to amendment and open to debate until it is concluded. But I, of course, am just as willing as any other Senator can be that the bill shall have its reading commenced on the day suggested by the Senator from Tennessee. That a Senator on that side or on either side of this Chamber shall be allowed two hours after that time to speak is a wholly unnecessary suggestion or agreement, because any Senator, in a moment after the bill shall have had its first sentence read, can rise in his place and debate the bill if he chooses to do so. So I wish for myself to exclude absolutely, in connection with the bill, the idea which has been excluded hitherto in the discussion of bills of like character, that we shall have a general debate here running for two weeks and that it is to close upon a particular day. I agree to the material suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee, which is that at a certain day we shall begin reading the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I will suggest to him that there is not the shadow of difference between his understanding and mine.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. HARRIS. I used the language "what is called general debate."

Mr. MILLS. And it is very appropriately used right here, because the debate now is over the whole subject; and Wednesday you commence to discuss the particular provisions of the bill, and then it becomes particular debate. But you can talk as long as you please on either.

Mr. ALLISON. There is another suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee which I desire to understand, and that is as to the disposal of amendments. He says the amendments of the committee are to be first considered. It is the rule, I understand, that when a paragraph is reached where the committee has proposed an amendment it shall be considered as respects that paragraph before any amendment shall be offered by a Senator.

Mr. HARRIS. That is what I mean.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand. I think that is a very proper suggestion, and I believe it has always prevailed hitherto.

Mr. HARRIS. Always in respect to tariff and appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. But when a paragraph is reached and the committee has no amendment, of course it is in order for any Senator to move an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. MILLS. Of course.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the more convenient method of dealing. Paragraphs that are reached before a committee amendment is reached are open to amendment, but when a committee amendment is reached it must be disposed of before any other amendment is offered to that paragraph.

Mr. ALLISON. I think another suggestion should be made, and that is, that the bill shall be considered by paragraphs as we proceed.

Mr. HARRIS. Such is the agreement between the Senator from Rhode Island and myself.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. It was not stated by the Senator, and I think it is important that we understand it.

Mr. HOAR. What does that mean?

Mr. HILL. That is what I wish to know. What does it mean?

Mr. HOAR. If you have passed one paragraph, say the chemical paragraph, and are on textiles or iron, is it understood that no Senator is at liberty, if he thinks of some amendment or one is suggested to him by a constituent, to go back and offer it?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not. The whole bill is open to amendment from the beginning to its ending, as all other bills have been open to amendment. It is merely for convenience as we go along. Every portion of the bill is open to amendment until the bill is completed, as I understand it.

Mr. HARRIS. My object is to secure a given number of hours every day that shall be devoted to the consideration of the bill. I have not sought by this agreement to change or modify the operations under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand.

Mr. HARRIS. But I wish to secure those hours, and I desire to have a time fixed when we shall commence the reading of the bill by paragraphs and dispose of them.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think there is no disagreement as to what the terms of the agreement are, as expressed by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think so either.

Mr. MILLS. It is in harmony with parliamentary law that the friends of a measure shall open and close the debate on it; and it is perfectly proper that the friends of this measure shall do that, as conceded by this agreement. There has been unlimited debate, according to the rules of the Senate, as the matter has progressed heretofore. I suggest, by way of being certain about the agreement, that whoever closes the debate for the bill on next Tuesday shall be permitted to take the floor at 1 o'clock and consume what time the speaker may think proper, as other gentlemen have done, and after that that the bill shall proceed.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no such thing as closing the debate. The debate on the bill will not be closed until after it has been ordered to a third reading. I have no objection to the Senator from Texas or any Senator selected by the other side of the Chamber having the entire day Tuesday, or any other day, if he wants to discuss the bill. We can agree upon that matter without the slightest difficulty. But I do object to the idea that the agreement is to be in the nature of a closing of debate on somebody's part.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to be understood about this matter, and I do not think there is any ground at all for a misunderstanding of it. There has been general debate upon all features of the bill tolerated by the Senate, and that general debate over the whole subject is to be terminated at a given time.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; by no means.

Mr. MILLS. Wait until I get through with my statement.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to know what the Senator from Texas means by that statement.

Mr. MILLS. I am going to tell the Senator, if he will allow me.

Mr. CULLOM. Go on.

Mr. MILLS. The general debate over the whole feature of the bill terminates on Tuesday, at whatever time the——

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no.

Mr. CULLOM. It will not, with my consent.

Mr. MILLS. Wait until I make my statement, and then the Senator can say what he pleases about it. Then, after that, the particular debate which may originate on an amendment, and which may cover the whole bill and may last from now until Judgment Day, will begin.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

Mr. LODGE. That is all right.

Mr. CULLOM. Now, I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Tennessee. If I undertake to make a speech on next Thursday and discuss items in different parts of the bill, giving my views generally upon the whole question, am I to be called to order as not directing my remarks to a specific paragraph?

Mr. HARRIS. Under the rules of the Senate such a thing is absolutely impossible.

Mr. CULLOM. Then why this "general debate" talk?

Mr. HARRIS. It is a mere quibble about what is the meaning of a word.

Mr. CULLOM. If that is all, let it go.

Mr. HARRIS. There has been what is called general debate, because there has not been a single paragraph in the bill read to which the debate was directed. When the hour comes for closing, I repeat myself in saying what is called general debate, then the reading of the bill commences, and a Senator may take the floor upon any amendment, no matter what it is, and——

Mr. CULLOM. He takes the floor upon the whole subject, however, and the amendment is merely read.

Mr. HARRIS. I believe I will conclude that sentence. When a Senator takes the floor he may talk as long as he pleases and about everything upon the face of the living earth and as far beyond as his fancy may lead him.

Mr. QUAY. I suggest that the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Rhode Island reduce their agreement to writing.

Mr. CULLOM. Oh, no.

Mr. QUAY. Then there will be no quibble as to the construction or the meaning of the agreement?

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me one moment, I will state that there are just two things in the agreement which are material, as I understand it. One is that we shall begin every day at 1 o'clock and continue until 5 uninterruptedly in this debate; and secondly, that on Wednesday next, at 1 o'clock, the first or formal reading of the bill, so-called—that is, reading it through without interruption—shall be dispensed with, and the Secretary at the desk shall begin to read, "Be it enacted," etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. And read on by paragraphs.

Mr. ALLISON. Those are the only two things involved in this whole agreement. And everybody agrees to those and to nothing else.

Mr. FRYE. That is to begin a week from to-morrow?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. QUAY. I was about to say, when the Senator from Iowa took the floor, that I feel it my duty to object to any arrangement which would interject the reading of the bill into the belly of the remarks which I commenced on Saturday last and which I am not likely to resume for a day or two at least according to present appearances.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the agreement asked for can not interfere with his rights to the floor up to Tuesday next, a week from to-day. I think it not improbable, though the Senator knows better than I, that he may possibly conclude his remarks before that time.

Mr. QUAY. There is no question about that, unless my time is occupied by Senators who desire to be heard and to whom I am compelled to yield, which is likely to occur to-day. I say "compelled to yield;" I mean as a matter of courtesy of course. I do not consent to an agreement by which my remarks shall be cut off.

Mr. ALLISON. After the first sentence of the bill is read by the Secretary, the Senator from Pennsylvania, if he does not finish his observations before, will rise in his place and go on as long as he desires.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He will hold the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. He will hold the floor, and there will be no possibility of interference with his right to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. One thing ought to be added to the statement of the Senator from Iowa. It is not very important practically, but still technically it is important. After the reading of the bill begins, when the place comes for the first amendment of the committee, that I suppose will be reported, and the pending question will then be on the amendment. But the rule for unlimited debate will go on.

Mr. SHERMAN. The rule for unlimited debate goes on all the time.

Mr. HOAR. All the time. However, what I rose for——

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts will not be construed into limiting amendments before the first committee amendment is reached.

Mr. HOAR. No: I do not understand that it does at all. What I said was, that whenever we reach a point where an amendment will be in order, then that amendment will be the pending question. However, I should not have risen for that suggestion alone. I do not regard it as very important. But I rose to give notice that I expect to be absent next week, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, and I expect to get the floor when I can after my return for a speech on the bill generally.

Mr. PEFFER. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Tennessee. When, according to his understanding of the agreement about to be entered into, will it be proper for me to propose the substitute which is upon the table and of which I have given notice?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know any reason why the Senator from Kansas may not propose it at any stage of the proceeding. Of course he knows that under the rules the text of the bill is amendable and his substitute is amendable, and they are both regarded as original propositions for the purpose of amendment. His amendment may be pending. He may offer it when he pleases, and it may be pending until finally disposed of, which may be the last thing done.

Mr. HILL. I desire to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether he regards anything in the agreement as it has been explained by him as inconsistent with a motion to proceed to the consideration of the free list contained in the bill?

Mr. HARRIS. The free list is a part of the pending bill, and, like every other part of the bill, it is to be dealt with by the Senate as a majority of the Senate may choose to deal with it.

Mr. HILL. That is not the question I propounded.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I do not quite understand the question.

Mr. HILL. In other words, under the agreement the Secretary proceeds with the reading of the first paragraph of the bill. Is there anything in the agreement to prevent a motion being entertained that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that portion of the bill known as the free list? It has struck me that with more propriety, before discussing the question as to what the duty shall be upon a particular article, it might be first well enough to determine the question whether there shall be any duty at all.

Mr. HARRIS. I think I comprehend the Senator's question.

Mr. HILL. I merely do not wish to be foreclosed in the making of such a motion, either in the form of a request for unanimous consent or by motion.

Mr. HARRIS. My answer, from a parliamentary standpoint, if I understand the Senator's question, is, that if in a particular paragraph a given duty is imposed upon a given article and the Senator from New York desires to strike that article from the dutiable list and put it upon the free list, it is an amendment that would be perfectly in order; or, vice versa, if an article that belongs to a particular paragraph is by the bill placed upon the free list and the Senator desires to transfer it to the taxable list, it will be perfectly in order to move to insert it as an article upon which a given rate of duty shall be imposed.

Mr. HILL. That I certainly well understood. That is not the point.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I can not comprehend the object of the inquiry.

Mr. HILL. In other words, does the agreement imply that the bill must be proceeded with exactly in its order all the way through?

Mr. HARRIS. It must necessarily be read in its order.

Mr. HILL. And must the consideration be had in its order?

Mr. HARRIS. In its order. That would be the parliamentary method, wholly independent of agreement, and it is not affected by the agreement in any way whatever.

Mr. MILLS. The agreement does not change the parliamentary law.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would be the rule in regard to any bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Precisely.

Mr. DOLPH. But the rule can be changed by a majority vote. It is not a rule that has to be enforced.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know of any such case or any such precedent.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator from New York will allow me to suggest, if I comprehend his purpose in this question, that he can accomplish the same result at any time by a motion to dispense with the regular reading and proceed to a special clause in the bill.

Mr. HILL. Let me suggest that then we shall be met by the objection I think, as I comprehend the point made by the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate has by unanimous consent declared otherwise.

Mr. HARRIS. The agreement between the Senator from Rhode Island and myself was to the effect that on Wednesday morning the reading of the bill should begin paragraph by paragraph, beginning with the first paragraph and taking the paragraphs in their consecutive order, as has been the rule in the Senate throughout its entire history. That is what the rules of the Senate require, what the parliamentary law of the case requires; and our consent agreement does not propose to interfere with it in any way. We simply dispense with the first formal reading of the bill, and proceed by paragraphs to read the bill through, and act upon the paragraphs as we reach them.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to ask him another question? In the absence of the agreement would it not be competent for the Senate to proceed to the discussion of the free list first?

Mr. HARRIS. That is a question of parliamentary law. The whole effect of the agreement, so far as it affects this matter, is simply that we dispense with the first general or formal reading. If the bill were formally read through, then the parliamentary status would be that the bill is before the Senate and every line of it is open to amendment, and any Senator could move to amend the last line or the first as he might choose; he could go to any part of it. But the bill would not be read again by paragraphs.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from New York pardon me for a suggestion in the line of his inquiry? As I understand the rule in the Senate, when a bill comes up it is read through for information. Then it becomes pending as in Committee of the Whole. Now, if it is a bill of 500 pages and the Senator from New York gets the floor first and moves to strike out the last word in the bill, that is the pending question, and it can not be displaced by somebody moving to strike out the first word or the first part, whatever the length of the bill. So, with the pending tariff bill, if, whenever the reading is going on under the rule which the Senator from Tennessee alludes to, and the bill has been read aloud, the Senator from New York takes the floor and moves to strike out the last item on the free list, nobody under the rules can get rid of a vote on that motion by doing something with the first paragraph. That is the universal law applying to appropriation bills and everything else unless the Senate agree to consider the bill by paragraphs.

Now, the effect of the agreement which the Senator from Tennessee proposes is to consider the bill by paragraphs, and that, as I understand it (the Chair will correct me if I am wrong), implies that motions to amend the first paragraph may be made as that paragraph is read and will be considered before motions can be entertained to amend later paragraphs, which are not to be considered until they are read.

Mr. HARRIS. That is exactly what I understand.

Mr. HOAR. But I understand that nobody claims you can not go back after you have got by one paragraph and move an amendment that you did not think of at the time.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me one moment?

Mr. HOAR. I am through.

Mr. ALLISON. The object of considering the bill by paragraphs is simply to put a paragraph in place of a section. All the question relating to duties is in a single section of the bill, and therefore we shall be jumping back from one part of the section to another from time to time unless we have an agreement practically that a paragraph shall be considered as a section.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Iowa pardon me for a suggestion?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose when the first paragraph is being dealt with the Senator from New York moves to amend the free list. He could not have that amendment voted upon?

Mr. ALLISON. No, not until the paragraph under consideration was disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Iowa understand that in ordinary bills—for instance the lottery bill just reported—an amendment to the first section takes precedence of an amendment to the last section in order of time?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not so understand, under our ordinary parliamentary rules. I can move to amend the fifth section, and when I move to amend it the motion must be disposed of. Then the Senator from Massachusetts can move to amend the third section, and so on. We substitute paragraphs for sections in this case; that is all.

Mr. DOLPH. I think I comprehend what the Senator from New York suggests and proposes, or at least thinks should be the method pursued in the consideration of the pending bill. The Senator from New York evidently believes that the whole free list should be first considered by the Senate; that the Senate should determine what articles are to go upon the free list and be admitted into the country free of duty before it undertakes to pass upon the amount of duties to be levied on dutiable articles. The Senator from New York does not wish to be precluded by this agreement from making a motion, when we commence to read the bill by paragraphs, that we shall proceed to the consideration of the free list first before we consider the other schedules of the bill.

It is true that a bill must be read. It must be read three times. We generally read it twice by title in the Senate before it is placed upon its final passage. The rules of the Senate require that course. The parliamentary usage is to commence at the beginning and read the bill through; yet I apprehend a careful consideration of the rule would show that if the Senate desired to proceed otherwise it could have the bill read backwards. That would be a reading of the bill, and a majority of the Senate could order that to be done. The bill would be read. We might improve the bill if we should do that. The bill would be read then under the rules of the Senate. It would be completely read, but it would not be read in the order in which it is usually found advisable to read a bill, to begin at the beginning and read it in the regular order.

But I have not a particle of doubt that the Senator from New York would be in order, and that his motion would be parliamentary if, when, under the agreement a week from to-morrow, the Secretary of the Senate shall commence to read the bill, he should move that we pass over the schedules of dutiable articles, and that we first consider, as in Committee of the Whole, and dispose of the free list. I think a majority of the Senate could order that course to be pursued. What the Senator from New York appears to wish to understand is whether the proposed agreement, in the judgment of the Senators who have made it, would preclude him from making such a motion.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Of course the Senator from Tennessee is entirely willing that the debate shall take whatever course the majority of the Senate desire to have it take.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know that the Senator from Tennessee would be entirely willing, but the rules secure the right, and the Senator from Tennessee can not help it.

Mr. HILL. I simply make this modification: I have no objection to the agreement as suggested here—it is not very explicit; still perhaps it is sufficiently so—with the further understanding that nothing agreed to shall prevent the Senate by a majority vote from proceeding to the consideration of the free list in case the Senate so desires. That is all.

Mr. MILLS. If it can do so under the rules?

Mr. HILL. Yes: if it can do so under the rules. I will make that proviso, and will then be perfectly satisfied. In other words, my point is simply this: I do not think it a wise procedure to discuss a question of rates before we discuss the question as to whether the article itself shall be placed upon the free list. In my judgment the best way to make the bill is to determine in the first instance what articles shall be dutiable and what articles shall be placed upon the free list. Having determined that question and made up your free list first, then proceed to the other question. I care not by what parliamentary method you arrive at that result. I think it would save time to make that disposition first. I simply ask to have reserved the right of the Senate to take that course if the Senate desires to take it and not be precluded by an objection that by unanimous consent we have agreed to a different course. There can be no objection to that.

Mr. WASHBURN. It seems to me, as I have understood the discussion, that the proposed agreement does not deal at all with the manner of discussing the bill after the paragraphs have commenced to be read, but that the agreement is preliminary to that time. So all this discussion as to whether we shall discuss the free list first or last will be a question that will come up naturally under the rules. The agreement in no way treats with the subject subsequent to commencing the reading of the bill by paragraphs. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if that is not the fact?

Mr. HARRIS. It affects it to this extent. If the bill were formally read as it came from the House of Representatives, it would never be formally read again in the Senate in its consideration. In that case an amendment would be in order to any line or word of the bill from the first to the last; I could offer an amendment to any paragraph or any line of it. But the agreement provides for dispensing with the formal reading for information and reading the bill paragraph by paragraph for amendment.

It means that the paragraphs shall be read in their order and shall be subject to amendment as in Committee of the Whole. When the Committee of the Whole shall have passed on the paragraphs and gone on to the last paragraph and acted upon that and passed it, the bill is then reported to the Senate, and the question is upon concurring in the Senate in the amendments made as in the Committee of the Whole; and any Senator may reserve any number of amendments he chooses or he may require every amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to be acted upon separately in the Senate. Then the whole bill and every part of it is open to amendment in the Senate, and an amendment may be offered as well to the last clause as to the first.

Mr. WASHBURN. Allow me to ask the Senator from Tennessee if that would not be the case if the agreement were not made?

Mr. HARRIS. I should so hold, but I am not sure I am right about it. I am not sure that a majority of the Senate may not vary the reading of the bill, but I am inclined to think it can not.

Mr. HILL. Has the Senator from Tennessee any objection to a reservation, that nothing in this agreement as expressed here shall prevent the ma ority of the Senate from proceeding to take up for consideration the free list?

Mr. HARRIS. I am tempted to say that I have no personal objection, for the reason that I am satisfied the Senate would never consent to such an irregular method of reading the bill.

Mr. HILL. Then there is no risk to run.

Mr. HARRIS. I say I am strongly tempted. I do not think a majority of the Senate would agree with the Senator from New York as to that method of reading.

Mr. HILL. All I ask is to have that right reserved, and if I can not convince the Senate——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator may reserve that right, if upon examination the parliamentary law that controls this body makes such a motion in order.

Mr. HILL. Of course; all right.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not seek to change the rule.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon and Mr. WASHBURN. That is all right.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from New York, under parliamentary law, would be in order in making such a motion, I shall interpose no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. HILL. The request of the Senator from Tennessee, as modified by the suggestion of the Senator from New York. I wish that to go upon the record.

Mr. WASHBURN. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has placed before the Senate, in order, the entire agreement which has been made. It includes everything which has been agreed upon.

Mr. HARRIS. The RECORD will of course show exactly what was said and what was reserved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not intend to exclude any part of the agreement.

Mr. WASHBURN. I desire to submit some observations on the pending measure either on Monday or Tuesday of next week. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee whether, if I make my remarks on Tuesday, it will interfere in any way with the understanding that is had now?

Mr. HARRIS. The agreement is that at 1 o'clock on Tuesday a Senator on this side of the Chamber shall be entitled to the floor for the purpose of consuming whatever time he may choose to occupy on that day.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. MILLS (to Mr. WASHBURN). Take Monday.

Mr. HARRIS. To next Monday there could certainly be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. Or Wednesday.

Mr. WASHBURN. In view of the statement made, I give notice that I shall ask the courtesy of the Senate to submit some observations on the pending measure on Monday at 1 o'clock.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senate for leave of absence until the 3d day of May.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The session I ask for will be very brief, I will say to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. QUAY. With the consent of the Senate, I have agreed to yield the floor to-day to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], and, after the conclusion of his remarks, to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TURPIE in the chair.) The Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, I am frank to say that if I had had the framing of a revenue bill, I would have presented a schedule of duties different in some particulars from the one under consideration. But as it is impossible to offer a tariff that will, in all of its features, receive the unqualified approval of every member of Congress, and as this bill is based upon the doctrine of a tariff for revenue in contradistinction from that of protection, in the sense of denying to the people of the United States the benefit of the markets and commerce of the world, I give it my unhesitating support.

It especially commends itself to me, in that it is a step in the direction of apportioning the expenses of the Government in proportion to the wealth of those who enjoy the security and protection of the laws of the country.

It more especially commends itself to me, in that it has been introduced into this Congress, and has gallantly and successfully fought its way through one of its branches, in utter defiance of that potential factor in American politics, the combined and organized wealth of those who have been fostered by the iniquitous laws enacted by a party whose power they purchased, and upon whose spoils they have fattened.

It need not be expected that a tariff bill, the purpose of which is to do justice to the millions who walk in the humble paths of life and "eat their bread in the sweat of their faces" can ever make its appearance in the Halls of Congress and not be fiercely assailed and most bitterly denounced by those whose vast accumulations of wealth are the monuments that mark the iniquity of a system of laws that not only imposes the expenses of government upon the toiling masses and those of moderate estate and virtually exempts the immensely rich, but, in addition to the expenses of government, levies a forced and unwilling contribution, without the semblance of consideration, to build these monuments to a reckless disregard of human rights and common justice—it would be permissible to say, of common honesty.

The bill may be obnoxious to criticism. It could hardly be possible, after so long a reign of a system operated by the unbridled license of a party dedicated more to private gain than to the common welfare, that the formidable array of resultant evils could be remedied by one enactment.

But it is framed and presented upon the principle that the Government must have revenue to defray its necessary economical expenses, and that the people who are the beneficiaries of just laws, faithfully and impartially administered, should contribute to this revenue in proportion to the property held under these laws.

It is a just principle.

It is further based upon the principle that when the Government has exacted from the people this amount of revenue it should tax them no further. It should not tax one of its citizens to give to another.

There is a party in this country, drawing its inspiration from the teachings of Thomas Jefferson, that believes and feels that the laws ought to rest with equal touch upon every citizen; that the blessings of government ought to be distributed with a just, equal, equitable, and impartial hand; that the function of government is to protect every man alike, whether rich or poor, humble or exalted, in his life, liberty, and property, and that the greatness of a country consists in the individual prosperity, welfare, and happiness of all of its citizens.

That, therefore, the earnings and property of one man ought not to be taken from him, by force or by legislation, and given to another.

There is another party, the antipode of that, born of avarice and drawing its inspiration from greed, that believes—I must accord to men that they believe what they say—that the greatness of a country consists in an aggregation of its wealth.

If they do not in words assert, the logical deduction of their political course is, that they believe a given quantity of goods, of a given nominal value, concentered in the possession of a comparatively few, redounds to the greatness of a country far more than double the quantity of property, of the same nominal value, distributed so that the people who have produced the property will all be allowed to retain a share therein, each the acquisition of his own labor, and of his own honest skill, business, and industry.

Such is the logical effect of the doctrine they proclaim; and the men who furnish the capital to purchase the power of the advocates of this doctrine are its beneficiaries, who "toil not, neither do they spin," yet they array themselves in multimillions not their own, either by the laws of Heaven or the equities of earth.

In 1892, by its legislation on this subject; by the nomination of its candidate, and by its platform, this party challenged the American people to a contest of strength. The gage was accepted, and that great representative, champion, and apostle of tariff reform, Grover Cleveland, was nominated on a platform of a tariff for revenue.

The issue was made, clear and pointed, and put to the suffragists of America to determine. The decision, the judgment of the country was rendered in favor of the people. The bill now before us is an offer to enter that judgment. In behalf of equity and the equal and impartial administration of justice; in the name of every one of the millions, thousands, hundreds, tens, and units of the voters who contributed to this result, and by the authority of their verdict, I summon every Democratic Senator to the support of this measure.

It is a measure to obtain revenue for the Government's expenses, including pensions, against a measure of extortion under the delusive name of protection, now on our statutes. This bill represents the doctrine of revenue against the doctrine of extortion.

The theory of our Government comprehends a system that is the simplest, purest, and best conception of the subject, by the human mind. It has no parallel in history. There is no other system of government where liberty in its full and true sense can be enjoyed.

It proceeds upon the idea that this is a country inhabited by a people every one of whom is, and of right ought to be, in reference to the laws, the equal of every other one—Jeffersonian Democracy. That there shall be no titled or privileged class or individual. That the function of the Government and of its laws is to maintain this right and to secure its enjoyment; and in consideration for these blessings and advantages of government each individual shall contribute to its support in proportion to his means.

It is a principle that aspires to the sublimity of that divine utterance of the world's Redeemer, "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you do ye even so unto them;" an utterance that has no equal in all the learning, philosophy, and wisdom of men: the promulgation of a principle that had its conception in Divinity.

Put this theory into practice by the enactment of just and impartial laws, in the place of the discriminating and extortion-breeding ones that now cumber the statute books, and you will not have multimillions of dollars hoarded away and occluded from circulation, and yet paraded in the statistics of the circulating medium, that its owners may procure the enactment of laws to factitiously appreciate its value and increase its power; nor will you have armies of paupers and vagrants marching upon the Capitol, nor tramps roving over the country, nor riotous strikes, where bloodshed and murder defy the laws of man and the will of Jehovah; but you will have a thrifty, prosperous, free, contented, and happy people, each the recipient of the fruits of his own labor.

You will have a country peopled with prosperous farmers, laborers, mechanics, carpenters, merchants, editors, doctors, lawyers, and of every other honest vocation. Then, instead of the distinguished, learned, and able Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] reading statistics of the growth of the country's wealth, he will see a far exceeding increase of the people's wealth, but he will see that it is more equally and justly distributed.

I lay it down as an indisputable proposition of justice and of common honesty that the Government has no right to take a dollar of any citizen's money without giving him its equivalent as a consideration. He is taxed to defray the expenses of the judiciary, legislative, and executive departments of the Government, and its equivalent as a consideration is given him in his security against domestic violence. He is taxed to build, equip, and man the Navy, and to erect fortifications to protect our seaboard, and he receives his consideration in security against foreign invasion. He is taxed for harbors and for the improvement of the great water ways of the country, for the transportation and safety of our marine, and receives consideration in the same security. But when he is taxed, when his money is taken from him by force, not of violence, to be sure, but by the equally effectual force of law, and does not go into the coffers of the Government's Treasury, but is given to another citizen, individual, or corporation, he is—I was about to say robbed, but since the word grates so harshly on the delicate ears of Senators, let me say—forcibly deprived of his money without an equivalent. For whether by force of violence or by force of law, he has received no equivalent, and the result to him is the same.

If the brigand meets the farmer on the highway, and at the point of the pistol forces him to surrender a dollar of the proceeds of his cotton or wheat, it is called robbery. If the manufacturer, by the use of his money and the power of the influence it gives him, procures the enactment of a law that shuts the markets of the world from this farmer and deprives him of the benefits and advantages of the world's barter, and thereby forces the farmer, out of the proceeds of his cotton or wheat, to pay him a dollar more for his manufactured implements, the result is the same to the farmer. Yet, if you denominate this last transaction robbery, the tender tympana of Senators tingle with holy horror.

If the doctrine of extortion, by its advocates falsely denominated protection for the sake of euphony, means anything, it means approximate exclusion of the commerce of the world. It levies a tariff, not primarily to go into the coffers of the country's treasury, but to prevent the importation of the merchandise of the world, and thereby to enable the manufacturer of this country to sell to the farmer, the laborer, merchant, editor, doctor, lawyer, railroad employé, factory hand, and every other consumer at a higher price. This increase of price represents the tax which the consumer pays to the manufacturer. When he buys foreign goods, he pays a tax to the Government; when he buys domestic goods, he pays a tax to the manufacturer.

If the tax paid to the Government is made equal and uniform, in proportion to the means of the taxpayer, by a just system of laws, of, this tax he does not complain. On the contrary, he takes pride in its payment, as a token of his identity as an integral part of this great commonwealth. But when he pays a tax to the manufacturer, who has no more right to tax him than he has to tax the manufacturer, he justly complains. Indeed, the Government has no right to tax him for the manufacturer, except that of power, and power does not always make right, or the robber would be right in the manner of his acquisition of his booty.

No man who appreciates and loves fair debate—honorable debate for the purpose of reaching just and true conclusions—can deny that the effect of the prohibitive tariff is to tax the consumer for the manufacturer; and further, that when the consumer buys domestic goods he pays a tax to the manufacturer and no tax into the Treasury; and that he pays a tax into the Treasury only when he buys foreign goods. The American retail merchant finds that his business calls for the purchase of $100 worth of table knives and forks. The value of these knives and forks is $100, and if the markets of the world were open to him the manufacturer would stand ready to sell them to him for this sum.

But the foreign manufacturer must pay $50 for permission to land his goods. If he sells his knives and forks for their real value, $100, he only receives $50 for them, half of their value, at which rate he would soon be ruined. He, therefore, is compelled to add the $50 duty he has paid, to the $100, the value of the knives and forks, and sell them, if he sells them at all, to the retail merchant for $150. The American manufacturer says to the merchant, I will sell you these goods for $145, and the merchant buys from this manufacturer $100 worth of knives and forks, for which he pays him $145.

The $45 does not represent the fair, reasonable, and honest profit of the manufacturer; that is represented in the value of the goods, the $100; but the $45 is the amount of tax paid to the manufacturer by the man who uses the knives and forks, and for which he receives no consideration. I say by the man who uses the knives and forks, because the merchant can not sell for less than he gives for the goods. In this way the farmer, merchant, railroad employé, factory hand, and all others who buy and use knives and forks pay this $45 tax to the manufacturer. And this is done under a system of laws for extortion, under the false cognomen of protection.

By a simple process of arithmetic it will be seen that $100,000,000, in value, of cutlery is sold at the forced price of $145,000,000, and that the sum of $45,000,000 of it does not go into the honest price of the cutlery, but is a tax extorted from those who use the cutlery, and paid to the manufacturer by force of laws enacted for extortion. By a just system of equal and impartial laws the manufacturer, to whom it does not of right belong, would not have this $45,000,000, but it would be distributed among the masses of the people, those who earned it and those whose labor produced it, and it would constitute a part of the wealth of the country, as much so as it does when extorted from its owners and producers to burden the coffers of the extortioner.

This is but an illustration of the unjust workings of the iniquitous system. The same thing applies to the purchase of clothing for the families of the laboring masses of the country, whether they labor upon the farm, in the shops, in the business offices, or in any other field, with this difference, that the tax paid to the manufacturer on clothing is greater. The sum total of this tax thus extorted from the people, and thus paid to the manufacturer, reaches into the hundreds of millions of dollars, which, under an honest system of laws, would remain the property and capital of its producers, and would in such way be distributed among the people by whose labor it is produced and earned.

Under a just system of laws the people, instead of paying all they make to placate the insatiate greed of the manufacturer, would have something of their earnings left to the enjoyment of themselves and their families. This they would spend with the tailor for their clothes; the shoemaker for their shoes; the farmer for flour; it would disseminate through the channels of commerce; the railroads would carry their trade and collect their tolls, and all conditions of life would be prosperous.

If the people could have it shown to them in figures; if every individual could see the money in one sum that is taken from him or her by this scheme of extortion every year, the people would stand appalled. They would wonder that they had ever tolerated such a system for one day, much less for decade after decade. It is not honest. No legerdemain of figures or statistics can demonstrate its honesty.

The excuse given as a palliation of this scheme of extortion in the incipiency of the Government was a plea that it was necessary to sustain our industries in their infancy, and that as soon as they were able to stand alone the policy would be abandoned, and they would be left to themselves to walk unattended by this nurse of protection. But when the tiger has once dipped his tongue in blood he does not relinquish his victim without a struggle. Those men who have blasphemed the sacred name of patriotism, in their sordid appeal to the love of country, that had its home in the bosoms of a noble people, just self-emancipated from British oppression, seeing that the people were fast becoming cognizant of the ability of those infant manufactories to stand alone and feed on stronger meat, must resort to some other expedient of deception.

What crimes, what outrages, what tyranny and oppression have been perpetrated in the name of liberty! Oh, the accumulated millions that have been wrung from the sweat of the laborer under the name of protection to labor. Seeing the futility of further appeal for unjust and forced contributions to infant industries, they invented the false pretense that their extortion was in the interest of protection to labor. Unselfish and generous men(?). The laws which they have procured to be enacted, under the false pretense of protection to labor, have been the wicked instruments of accumulating for themselves colossal fortunes whose figures stagger arithmetic. How unselfishly they are enlisted in the cause of the laborer(?). I would distrust the candor of the man who asserts that he is acting in my interest in his enactment of laws and makes no mention of his own advantage, thereby impliedly asserting that mine is the only welfare sought, when I would see him extorting millions of dollars from the transaction. So, when I hear the manufacturer say he is clamoring for these laws that labor may be protected, and then see him thereby wrest from the laborers of the land multimillions of dollars that have cost the sweat and often the blood of the poor and their families, I denounce his pretensions as hollow mockery.

I make no war upon the rich because they are rich. I do not envy them their affluence. I would rather pray, in the language of one of old, to "make me neither rich nor poor." I do not object to the honest amassment of wealth. Nor would I unjustly take from its owner one dollar of his possessions. But I earnestly enter my most solemn protest against its dishonest and unfair acquisition. In the same breath in which I would enter my disclaimer of any purpose or desire to wrong or assail the rich because of his riches, I would most respectfully, yet most earnestly, commend to Senators that injunction of Holy Writ, which is sanctioned by the authority of Him who with the blast of his nostrils gathered the waters together, stood the floods upright as an heap, and congealed the depths in the heart of the sea, "oppress not the poor because he is poor."

It is easy enough for unjust men, when objection is made to the dishonest means of the acquisition of their wealth, to inveigh against those who enter their righteous protest, and to charge that it is an envious assault upon the rich, who have accumulated their fortunes by laudable thrift. By such vicious and empty charges against the humbler classes of our citizens, fulminated in meaningless platitudes, they hope to divert public scrutiny from the unrighteous means to which they have resorted for the acquirement of their ill-gotten gains. No; the working masses, who toil with brain and muscle in their fields, in their shops, in their storehouses, over the counter, and at their books, in their law offices and doctors' rooms, on the railroad, and in every vocation where honest earnings are acquired, do not envy the opulence of the rich. They ask not for a law to restore to them the spoils they have suffered, but they ask for that humble meed of tardy justice that will allow them in the future to own for themselves and for their families that which they make; and for this meager mite of equity I, a humble one of their number, am here to plead.

You do not protect labor by laws through which you enrich yourselves upon the toil of the laborer. You do not protect labor by laws which shield you from honest competition of prices, and thus allow you to sell to the laborer at an exorbitant price, and to that degree impoverish him. The law that prohibits competition with you in making sales allows you to increase your prices and augment your fortunes, but does not benefit the laborer; on the contrary, it adds to the prices he pays for your wares, and to that extent injures him. The law that prevents competition with him in labor is the law that raises his wages. The laborer's wages are not affected by the price the manufacturer receives for goods. The price of labor is regulated by the same inexorable law that controls all other prices—the law of supply and demand. If two employers run after one employé, labor is high; if two employés run after one employer, labor is cheap. Not an advocate of prohibitive legislation can dispute this. If he does, it only betrays the poverty of the argument to which he is reduced.

To meet the force of this fact the advocates of the extorsive system allege that the effect of the system is to increase factories and thereby the demand for labor. But this is the veriest speculation, predicated upon a contradiction of the known laws of trade and business. Through the influence and operation of the extorsive system the manufacturer sells to the laborer at exorbitant charges and his modest income is soon exhausted. This happens to all classes of business and industry, and from it they all suffer. The modest incomes of the shoemaker, blacksmith, carpenter, railroad hand, farmer, clerk, salesman, bookkeeper, merchant, shop hand, and all other industries flow into the capacious coffers of the manufacturer, and their supply is soon exhausted. Though these toiling people are scantily fed and thinly and poorly clad, their narrowly limited incomes being exhausted, they can buy no more.

The manufacturer, sheltered behind extorsive laws, interlocked with combines and trusts, can refuse to sell at reasonable rates; but allows his wares to lie idle until the toil of labor produces other incomes for their purchase. He has swept into his coffers the available incomes of the country, and still has a surfeit of goods to cumber his warehouse and supply the demands of future seasons. He has no need to manufacture other wares, and of course no necessity for labor, and the laborer goes begging for employment. Thence come strikes, riot, bloodshed, and murder. If you call it prosperity when all the wealth of the country has been dumped into the receptacles of the favored few, and parade your statistics of increase of wealth, concentrated in this few, through the extorsive system, and claim that this increase of the wealth of the country is due to the iniquitous system, under the simple but fallacious argument, post hoc ergo propter hoc, I can, with far more reason, retort, and arraign this system for the murder of the people at Homestead and Uniontown; for the strikes all over the land; for the money panic of last year and of 1873; and for the tramping armies of paupers and vagrants who straggle through the country.

But if the laws had been shaped in the interest of all the people alike, these scantily fed and poorly and thinly clad laborers of the country would have been able to have supplied themselves and their families with the conveniences, comforts, and even luxuries of life; to have consumed all the yield of manufacturing labor, thus creating a demand for more manufactured goods, and a corresponding demand for skilled labor; and the demand for labor being increased, there would be a corresponding increase in its price and assurance of its permanency.

This commerce would furnish business for railroad transportation, from the fares of which their exchequers would be replenished. Its handling would require more help and give employment to railroad laborers and clerks and other railroad employés, whose salaries and wages would buy provisions and clothing from the merchants, produce from the farms, and in many and various ways the money of the country would be more generally and justly distributed through the channels of commerce, and would thereby tend to stay the tides of panic and disaster.

I make no war upon the manufacturer because he is a manufacturer. I feel that there are manufacturers who do not ask for this unjust discrimination in their favor. The business of manufacturing is an honorable one, and of great advantage and benefit to the country and to mankind. If there be dishonor, it does not attach to the business of manufacturing, but to the man who seeks for laws through the operation of which he may be allowed to practice extortion. It turns out many useful and beneficent products, as an instance of which I may name the polished furniture and finished engine, beautiful to the eye and valuable to the service. But the manufacturer does not enjoy a monopoly of usefulness. The farmer who endures the hardship and exposure of toil, in heat and cold, sunshine and rain, and sleet and snow and mud, to produce the food and raiment with which all the populations of the earth are fed and clothed, is surely a benefactor, than whose claims upon the blessings of government and the consideration of the lawmakers none should be held more sacred.

The laborer who delves in mines for the coal with which you are warmed, the iron that makes your implements of labor, and for the gold and silver that make your medium of exchange as well as your ornaments; the humble day laborer who builds your railroads, and in exposure and danger handles your freights, as well as the engineer who with steady hand holds the throttle and with sleepless eye guards you against danger, while in conscious security you take your speedy travel; the merchant whose capital and labor advances commerce; the doctor whose skill and the druggist whose store alleviate humanity; the lawyer who construes the laws; and numbers of other classes, are all equally with the manufacturer worthy of and entitled to the blessings of government.

To show beyond peradventure that the system of extortion does not benefit the laborer, and that the pretense that it is practiced for protection to labor is a shameful mockery and a delusive snare, I challenge consideration of some facts which I will present and one feature of the McKinley bill: and even the extortionist, when he fairly considers these, if he is not blind to facts and deaf to reason and argument, must see that the statistics of increase of wealth in the South, so exultantly paraded in this debate, are not due to this extorsive system.

One feature of the McKinley bill is a tariff tax of 45 per centum ad valorem on all imported cotton machinery. Now, it is a fact that this duty on imported machinery enables the American manufacturer of cotton machinery to add 45 per cent to the price of his machinery when he sells it. It is a fact that this added cost of the machinery for the manufacture of cotton goods embarrasses the manufacturer of cotton and impedes the progress of cotton factories. It is a fact that 5,000,000 of people in Great Britain are engaged in the labor of manufacturing cotton goods, and that three-fourths of the cotton that they manipulate is shipped from the United States.

What an inestimable advantage it would be to the factory laborers of America if the manufacture of all this cotton was transferred from Great Britain to the United States. The transfer of any part of it is proportionately advantageous. If it were transferred to the United States, and those self-nominated friends and self-appointed guardians of the skilled laborers of the country were sincere, and would procure the enactment of laws that would effectually prohibit the admission of competitive laborers to our shores, it would indeed be a laborers' harvest. Then would two of those selfsame men, employers, run after one employé, and the price of labor would be high, and we would repose some modicum of faith in the sincerity of their protestations, when they pretend that their solicitude for the enactment of extorsive laws is purely in the interest of labor, while they themselves harvest from such laws more than half of the wealth of the country. The price which these laws add to their goods must come out of the pockets of somebody or bodies; it does not drop from the sky.

Let us see whether the operation of the McKinley bill tends to transfer the manufacture of this cotton to us, and thus to give employment to the skilled labor of the United States, or whether its operation tends to drive it from the United States. I can best illustrate this by an instance that comes under my own observation. A friend of mine, Mr. A. E. Randle, of Washington City, a manufacturer, who does not believe in the efficacy for good to the country of laws that unjustly discriminate against any American citizen, conceived a plan for the establishment of a cotton factory in Mississippi. He issued bonds for the purchase of the machinery, and had the money to put it in operation. He went to Massachusetts to purchase the machinery, and it was offered to him for $290,000 cash. He was unable to purchase the machinery with the bonds or with stock in the enterprise.

Of this I have no complaint to make. But he went to England, and was offered the same machinery for $200,000, for which the factory company's bonds and stock in the enterprise would be accepted, without the advancement of a dollar. By the operation of the McKinley bill Mr. Randle, an American citizen, was required to pay $90,000 customs duties, which he was unable to raise in addition to that necessary to erect and operate the machinery, and he thereby failed in his effort to establish an industry that would have given employment to labor. The duty was 45 per cent, and the Government received no revenue, because the tariff was so high that it prohibited importation. If the duty had been 10 per cent—less than one-fourth of what it was—the importer could have raised this amount: the Government would have received $20,000 of revenue; the country would have had $200,000 worth of property added to its wealth—because the property would have paid for itself—and skilled labor would have found additional employment.

If you will take the entire duty from cotton machinery, and make its importation free, it will be but a question of a few years when the entire crop of American cotton will be manufactured upon American soil by American labor. The price of labor will therefore rise; but the manufacturer of cotton machinery will not reap such a rich harvest of spoils. In the face of these facts, reason becomes restive and argumentation audacious when monopolists persistently proclaim that they are prompted in their advocacy of a high tariff duty purely by a motive of protection to labor. The cry of protection to labor is hollow hypocrisy, and is only raised to do duty in the effort to enlist the laborers of the country in this unholy crusade against civilization, as well as against the rights of the citizen. In the same spirit, and for the same purpose, are duties levied for pretended protection to other classes than the manufacturer, in order to enlist these classes in the protection crusade, when in fact these classes are losers by its operation; as for instance the wool-growers, who by this system are given one dollar and robbed of ten, as was demonstrated in this debate by that great Indianian Senator VOORHEES, of whose transcedent ability and matchless eloquence, and broad and comprehensive statesmanship, his State and the country may well feel proud.

The time will come when every wage-earner and every man of every class who has taken partnership in this unrighteous scheme of oppression will curse the day he entered its association, as the "necromancer in the grasp of the evil spirit curses the day he first meddled with the black art of sorcery." It bodes no good to the country; it gives no gain to the laborer. Protection to labor, indeed (?). Philanthropic motive (?). Let us strip this motive of its mask and see it naked in all of its hideous deformity. It can not be denied by these assumed philanthropists that through the operation of their system they are enabled to raise the prices of the goods they sell to laborers, as well as to others, and money is thereby extorted from these purchasers by which they are enriched.

The laborer in the cotton field, who produces material for the clothing of the people, can not earn more than $120 a year; less than 35 cents a day. If he produces, gathers, and prepares for market six bales of cotton, worth $180, it is a good crop. One hundred and twenty dollars for his wages deducted from this this sum leaves $60 for the feed and hire of his plow team, the purchase of implements, and the rent of land. To produce and gather this crop he is exposed to all the inclemencies of the weather, and is liable to the dangers of pneumonia and death. I know whereof I speak. I was raised on a farm, and have endured all of its hardships and toil, and I deeply sympathize with this worthy, honest, and honorable class of our citizens. No man will deny that if this laborer, as he is compelled to do, buys his clothing for his family, or implements for his labor, the protective system of these philanthropists is intended to increase the price he must pay. And this increase of price is taken from this laborer, and goes into the pockets of these philanthropists under the guise of philanthropic devotion to the interest of labor!

So you see that when the mask is raised it is the interest of the pretended philanthropists and not of labor that is intended to be subserved. Yet this mockery of philanthropy is flourished in the faces of the people under the hypocritical pretense of protection to labor. Philanthrophy is born of purer mold. It does not rob the poor. The exclusory laws of the extorsive system, under the more euphonious name of protection, approximately prohibit the importation of machinery to manufacture this man's cotton, and thereby tend to deny employment for labor. Yet these philanthropists proclaim that their solicitude is purely in behalf of labor.

After I was elected, and while I was making preparations to come to Washington and take my place in this Chamber as a United States Senator, I passed an old black man whom we know in my town as "Uncle Prince," who makes a humble and honest living by chopping wood. Addressing me, he said, "Make laws to help the poor man." The first question that naturally suggests itself to the mind is, What righteous law would help this poor man? I find on the statutes a law that compels him to pay, when he purchases his ax, a tax of 45 per cent to the manufacturer. When he buys his unpretentious clothing, he pays to the manufacturer a still higher rate of tax; so that out of the little sum that he earns in a year of less than $150 he is forced by this vicious legislation to give up to the manufacturer at least $20, for which he receives no possible equivalent. And this under laws that pose as protection to labor! The result to him would be the same if he was forced at the point of the pistol to give up his $20 to the brigand. I thought if a righteous law could be enacted, not to give him paternal care and protection, but to allow him, instead of the manufacturer, to have his $20, it would "help the poor man," and he would ask nothing more. In private transactions, without the intervention of the cloak of the law, nothing less than this would satisfy the demands of common honesty.

But they complain that we are trying to extirpate this system at one sweep; that we want immediate and exact justice. They claim that they have practiced this extortion so long that it has become a second nature, and that it must not be too suddenly disrupted. And when we chafe under the galling load, they denounce us, on the principle, I suppose, of a boy who appealed to his mother to "make Bill behave himself; every time I hit him on the head with the hammer he hollers." [Laughter.] Now, after this system of wrong and injustice has given special privileges to one class at the expense of other classes, and this inequality has been suffered and endured for long years, if we ask for laws of equality and impartiality we are told that it is a blow at the industries of the country. We are anxious to know wherein it is a blow to these industries? The answer is, that it repeals the laws that enable them to sell to us at higher and artificial prices. The blow consists in the repeal of laws that discriminate against the people in their favor. They consider it a fearful blow if impartial law puts them upon an equality with other people and compels them to sell their goods upon their merits, as the laborer is paid for his labor on its merits.

The extorsive system makes artificial values, constantly changing with the artifice, and thereby creating panics and disaster. Before business can ever settle upon a safe basis this tariff question must be permanently settled. The reflecting mind will not be long in concluding that it can not be permanently settled until it is settled upon just and fair principles. As long as the human heart pants for purity, and the human mind soars for light; as long as there exists in American manhood a spirit of liberty, independence, and equality, this struggle for impartial tariff laws will continue.

But they say the wealth of the country increased under the protective system. A pertinent inquiry is, Did the protective system produce or cause the increase of wealth? They say it did, because the protective system existed when the wealth increased. But the protective system existed when the money panics of 1873 and 1893 came. Did, therefore, the protective system produce or cause the panics? It is just as logical to say that it did. The protective system existed when we had the yellow fever epidemic of 1878. Did the protective system produce the epidemic? It is equally as logical. Did the protective system cause the Johnstown flood? It existed then, and it is just as logical to say that it did.

Before it can be shown that the protective system has produced the country's wealth there must be shown some relation between the cause and effect. The protective system aggregates wealth in the possession of a few. The cause is that the laws are made to discriminate in favor of those few at the expense of the people; to allow those few to practice extortion upon the people, and they soon extort all the wealth of the country and become rich. Here is a direct relation between cause and effect.

The growth of wealth is produced in one of two ways: Either (1) the country produces it and the manufacturers get it; or (2) the manufacturer acquires it by selling his manufactures abroad. If the first, then the protective system is not the cause of the growth of wealth: if the second, then the industries do not need legislation to enable them to stand, but only need it to enable them to plunder.

If the manufacturer can not compete in prices with foreign imported goods without legislation that enables him to sell higher than the foreign goods are sold, how does the system tend to increase the growth of wealth? If he must sell for $1,500 an engine for sawing lumber that the foreign manufacturer can sell for $1,000, then if you do not have an extorsive system to prohibit the importation of foreign engines three engines will be purchased and do duty in the country instead of two of the same kind, and the country's wealth will be greater by one engine. That the artificial means, the discriminating legislation, have given the two engines the same nominal value that the three of the same kind have do not make them worth as much intrinsically as the three. They can not do as much work, they do not give as much employment to labor, and they can not contribute as much to comfort and convenience as the three.

Yet in the statistics of wealth the two engines are put down at $3,000, whereas but for the laws that prohibited importation the country's wealth would have contained three engines. It is the amount of property and the convenience and comfort to which it contributes, and not its assessed nominal and artificial value, that constitute the country's wealth. You have seen that by these forced and artificial values the country contains only two-thirds the amount of property—two engines where it could have three. But for extorsive legislation, it will be seen from this illustration, the property of the country would be one-third more than it is.

If there is any branch of American manufacture that can not compete with foreign manufacture, the people would obtain the benefit and advantage of the cheap market afforded by the foreign manufactories, and the capital invested in this branch of manufacture would be diverted to something that would be profitable to its owners, and that would require labor, and thus make the demand for labor equally as great, and even greater, and therefore labor would be as remunerative as it would be if employed in manufactories that required the aid of protective duties. The manufacture of that wherein we can excel foreign manufactories would be largely increased, and its sale abroad would redound to the wealth of this country. Why should we spend $10 to make that which we can buy for five? Better invest the $10 in some other industry that gives a better return.

The farmer can at home, with the old-fashioned spinning wheel and loom, make the cloth for his clothes. But with less than a tenth of the labor, and in less than a tenth of the time, he can make the farm products with which to buy the cloth, and he therefore buys instead of makes them. Labor and employment are thus diversified and business transacted. By the natural laws of business and industry and trade, without the intervention of discriminating legislation, all the capital and labor of the country are employed where they will bring the best returns. Each buys that which he can buy cheaper than he can make it, and sells that which he can make cheaper than his neighbor. The same economy will apply to a people. That rule of economy that works well when applied in the instance of an individual will work well when applied in the affairs of a people, because the people are but the sum of the individuals. But they say, if the markets of the world are open to us the balance of trade will be against us. This rests upon the assumption that we, as a people, will consume more than we are able to produce. But we can not buy abroad more than that for which we are able to pay. They point us to the custom-house account of exports and imports to show that the balance of trade is against us.

Let us test this account. Mr. Randle, of Washington City, ships from New York a cargo of cotton that cost him $200,000. He sells it in Liverpool at a profit of 20 per cent, and realizes $240,000. This sum he invests in Liverpool in English goods, and sells them in New York for $288,000, 20 per cent profit in each transaction. The custom-house account shows, exports, $200,000; imports, $240,000, and it is accounted, in striking the balance of trade, as $40,000 against our country, when, in fact, a citizen of our country is worth $88,000 more by the transaction, and the country, where it had $200,000 worth of property, has received therefor $240,000 worth of property, a growth of the country's wealth of property of $40,000.

But if Mr. Randle's ship had sunk between New York and Liverpool, with its exports of $200,000 worth of cotton, and the whole cargo had been lost to him and to the country, the custom-house accounts would have shown a balance of trade in our favor of $200,000, so far as this transaction was concerned. So, you may see that the balances struck by the custom-house accounts do not furnish a safe criterion of the growth or loss of the country's wealth.

One more thought before I leave the subject of the customs duties. It is exceedingly important that there should be a rate of duties that are approximately permanent. Business is uncertain, and business men are in doubt and difficulty in making their purchases when the customs schedules are constantly fluctuating. Under the Republican doctrine of a tariff to artificially raise prices it is compelled, in the very nature of things, to be uncertain and fluctuating, because it has no fixed, permanent basis for its levy, and would always depend upon the cupidity of its beneficiaries, and upon their influence in securing a schedule to feed that cupidity, while under the Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue only, which abhors the prostitution of one of the necessary agencies of government, there is a solid and safe basis for a schedule of duties, which basis is the revenue necessary for the economical expenses of the Government, and if the duty is levied upon this basis it will be approximately permanent. Until this is done there will be a constantly changing schedule of duties and a corresponding timidity of business.

Before I conclude I beg your patient indulgence while I devote a few moments to the investigation of the income-tax feature of this bill.

I deny the contention that the Democratic platform of 1892 declared in favor of raising revenue by customs duties exclusively. If it had so declared, then the principle would receive my earnest support.

I believe and feel that every Democratic Senator and Representative is impliedly pledged and in honor bound to perform in good faith and in letter and spirit every principle enunciated in that platform, and so is the Executive.

Each one of these Democratic officials owes it to himself, and to the country, as well as to the Democratic party, to do this, or to resign to the party the commission with which he has been intrusted. Otherwise he has no right to speak for the Democratic party. Therefore it is that, if such a principle were contained in that platform, it would receive my support.

The platform has no reference, either expressly or impliedly, to the question of an income tax.

There was a controversy between the two great parties as to the purpose to which the tariff should be devoted. One party, the Republican party, contended that the tariff should be devoted to the purpose of prohibiting the importation of foreign goods into this country, because they said that if the importation of foreign goods is permitted, the country will be deluged with goods; the markets will be glutted, and goods will be cheap; and, therefore, the manufacturer will not be able to sell for high prices, and that will impoverish the country.

The other party, the Democratic party, held that the tariff should not be devoted to any other purpose than to raise revenue; that with this limitation the markets of the world should be open to the people; that if the importation of goods should glut the markets, and make them cheap to the people, it was impossible for them to see how this would impoverish the country. With this issue in mind, and to make it clear and pointed, the convention said a tariff should be for revenue only, and it was overwhelmingly sustained by the people.

The argument that has been offered in this debate, that this means that all the revenues should be derived from customs duties is farfetched, and could only be invoked in support of a weak contention.

It is virtually admitted in the speech of the able, learned, and distinguished Senator who offered this contention, that through the customs duties the rich do not pay their proportionate share of the expenses of the Government, and that the poor pay more than their proportion. He proposed to offset that admission by the assertion that the poor contribute nothing to the expenses of the State, county, and municipal governments.

I deny the assertion.

To illustrate his assertion the Senator took an extreme case—a man who has no property, real or personal. I meet him on this ground.

This man pays his poll tax, and works the streets and the roads, serves in the militia, and when the calamity of war comes, sheds his blood and sacrifices his life for the defense of his country, and that the rich may be secure in their riches.

But let us take the example of one who is not so destitute. Take the man whose land and personalty amount to the modest sum of $1,000—one-fifth of a year's salary of the Senator. He pays, in addition to his poll tax and street tax, his proportionate share of the expenses of State, county, and municipal governments. Yet through the customs duties he pays far more to the General Government, as the virtual admission of the Senator allows, than the rich do, in proportion to their means and wealth. But there is no admission of the Senator needed to prove the inequality of the system. By a simple application of arithmetic it is proved.

All fair-minded political economists agree that the consumer pays the customs duties.

If the man whose unpretentious estate sums up $1,000 consumes $200 worth of dutiable goods, he is paying a duty on the value of one-fifth of his estate. Could you expect him to subsist on less? He must have implements with which to work, and they are all taxed; he must have clothes for himself and his wife and his little ones to protect them from the scorching rays when they toil in the heat of the summer's sun and from the cold blasts of the bitter, biting winter's wind when it comes hurtling from the frozen North with frost on its wing. For, be it known, his sensibilities are as keen, and his wife and children are as dear to him as those of the rich are to them.

But the wealth and incomes of the rich are so superabundant that they do not consume dutiable goods thus proportionate to their wealth.

The man who owns $10,000,000 would have to consume $2,000,000 worth of dutiable goods before he would pay a tax in proportion to the man who owns $1,000 and consumes $200 worth of dutiable goods. So that, each paying taxes on the value of the dutiable goods he consumes, as the rich do not consume that value of dutiable goods in proportion to their wealth that the poor are compelled by their necessities to consume, it follows, as the day follows the night, that the rich do not pay their proportionate share of the revenue.

To remedy this and to make some approach toward equality the income tax is proposed.

It ought to commend itself to the fairness, justice, and impartiality, to say nothing of the magnanimity, of the rich. Two cents of every dollar, not of their estates, but of their incomes above $4,000.

To take this just and reasonable share of the Government's expenses would not deprive them of a single convenience, comfort, or luxury that they enjoy; while the tax heaped upon the poor, by unjust and discriminating legislation, often sends their children to bed hungry.

I do not ask the rich for the charity of a dollar in behalf of these people. If I were to do so, their manhood would revolt. But I ask that the rich pay their proportionate share of the expenses of the Government. And when I do this I am pronounced a demagogue. I suppose this charge is in the sense that we who advocate this measure declaim sentiments that do not receive the approval of our judgment in order that we may ingratiate ourselves into the favor of our people.

That I desire the good opinion of the people of my State I do not deny: but that I utter any sentiment or thought on this subject that is not the judgment of my mind and hope of my heart, I summon their unanimous testimony to brand as false.

Is not the cause of this people just? And may not one plead the cause of justice without incurring the charge of duplicity?

When I see learned and able Senators, of lofty bearing and of gentle and courteous demeanor, who would spurn a dollar of unfair gain in a private transaction, enlisted in this crusade, I am reminded to exclaim, in the language of Fitz-James to Rhoderick Dhu:

> Methinks a soul like thine would scorn,
> The spoils from such foul foray borne.

But it is said that the clerk who receives $6,000 a year must pay a tax on $2,000 of his salary. Ought he not to pay more than the clerk who receives $1,000 a year? Under a rule of inequality, kindred by affinity to the inequality of the tariff, female help is not paid as much as men are paid for the same quality and quantity of work.

The female clerk who receives $1,000 a year pays far more, in proportion, than the six-thousand-dollar clerk, through the customs duties; and one way—the best that has been offered—to approximately equalize them is to tax a portion of the income of the six-thousand-dollar clerk. Otherwise she, of her small salary, is paying a part of his tax. I do not believe the average six-thousand-dollar clerk would ask to be the recipient of the avails of such a wrong. Shame upon the clerk who would impose the discharge of his obligations upon a helpless woman. Adam-like, when he is cornered in his crime, he is willing to exculpate himself at the expense of the woman. There is reason to hope that, after more than eighteen centuries have rolled between us and the crucifixion of the Redeemer for the sin of Adam, woman will receive some recognition of justice, and that there will be but few Adams who will desire to throw their tax obligations upon her shoulders.

I plead at the bar of the sense of justice of the rich; cease your opposition to this income tax. It is not undemocratic. Democracy means that the people rule, and as sure as the people rule this tax will be levied. Be not deceived, the people are not deceived. Meet the people in a spirit of fairness and equality, and show them that you are willing to contribute your proportion to the Government's support; and if it produces a surplus in the Treasury, as has been argued, take that much off their shoulders by reducing the tariff on some article of their necessary consumption.

You have not sounded the people on this question. You hear the rich talk, but the poor obtain no audience in your ear. They know the justice of this measure; they make the demand that it shall avail.

Mr. President, in this humble contribution to this debate I have sought to excite investigation, rather than to satisfy its inquiry. This is no time, this Chamber is no place, and this debate is no occasion for the venting of spleen. This is the time and place to discard personal spite, and this is the occasion for the exercise of broad and comprehensive statesmanship. Let no man abandon the ship because there hang upon the horizon the murky clouds of political reverses. These are elections in the springtime. The Republicans are men of leisure, who have time to attend elections. The Democrats are at work to make money to pay the tariff and to pay the manufacturer. Wait until the fall elections come, and they will have time to attend and elect Democrats. The people will appear at the polls, and their voices will be heard. They who compose the bone and sinew and blood and tendon of the country; who toil in field and factory, in storehouse and shop, in business offices and upon the railroads, and in all the departments of manual and mental labor, and who shine in the firmament of citizenship like diamond dust set in the background of heaven.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, at some future time I may consider it my duty to the State which I know I represent and to the political organization which I hope I represent to say a few words in a general way concerning the tariff bill now under consideration. For the present, however, I shall confine my remarks to that portion of the measure which provides for a tax upon incomes.

I oppose that provision for certain distinct reasons which I shall endeavor to make plain to the Senators who are here or may by chance arrive during the next hour. I oppose it and shall do everything in my power to defeat it, first, because it is unnecessary; second, because it is unjust; third, because it is unsuccessful; fourth, because it is unpopular; fifth, because it is undemocratic; sixth, because it is un-American; seventh, because it is unwise; and finally, on general principles, because it is unworthy of an intelligent government, supposed to represent a free and enlightened people.

With the indulgence of the Senate, I shall give a few moments to each of these objections in the order named.

It is unnecessary. In a time of need a government is warranted in adopting even obnoxious devices to obtain money for self-preservation. This Government was justified in doing so during the civil war. European governments, confronted by the shadow of a great conflict which may be precipitated at any moment, may now be excused for inflicting this hateful system upon their peoples. I grant that necessity affords a fair and proper reason for its use. But no such necessity exists in our own country at this time. We are not engaged in war, nor is there the slightest basis for a belief that we shall be for at least a generation. With the single exception of the money required for pensions, we have to meet only the ordinary expenditures for economical administration, and we have done so even under a tariff which is distinctly prohibitive in its nature and was designed to reduce revenues.

It is true that there is now a deficiency; but it arose, not from the excess of ordinary expenditures over ordinary receipts, but from specific acts whose requirements have been met and can not recur. In fact, the total of the sums paid during the past three years for the refund of direct taxes, for sugar bounties, for the extinction of titles to Indian lands, for the census, for "first payments" upon pensions, and for new war vessels far exceeds the amount of the present deficiency.

Of these expenditures a very small percentage can by any possibility continue. The refunding of the direct taxes is completed. No more sugar bounties will be paid. The cost of extinction of titles has been met. The census work is practically ended. "First payments" upon pensions, it is true, seem likely to continue so long as life shall last, but as we approach the third generation of pensioners we may, at least, hope that "first payments" will become less numerous. The Navy is big enough to take care of itself till we have more money to spend for further additions, and the estimate for 1895 is nearly $3,000,000 less than the amount paid last year.

Dropping these nonrecurrent expenditures, allowing for the natural reduction in pension payments, and accepting the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury for the Departments, public works, and all other purposes, the total amount of money required for the year ending June 30, 1895, need not exceed $350,000,000. The actual expenditures for the year ending June last amounted to $383,000,000. This means a saving on the one hand of more than $30,000,000.

The sole question, therefore, is that of receipts; and here we enter the field of conjecture. It is easy to assume, and it has been assumed most persistently by advocates of the income tax, that reduction of duties means a corresponding reduction in revenues. But this is no more than assumption of fact, which does not and can not exist, for the purpose of argument. It is not only unsound in theory, but untrue in practice. During the five years prior to the passage of the McKinley act there was a steady increase in customs receipts. They amounted in 1885 to $181,000,000; in 1886, to $192,000,000; in 1887, to $217,000,000; in 1888, to $219,000,000; in 1889, to $223,000,000, and in 1890, to $229,000,000.

The increase in five years from 1885 to 1890 was $48,000,000. A corresponding increase during the present five years would have yielded a revenue from customs for the year ending June 30, 1895, of fully $280,000,000. Had the tariff then in force remained untouched and business conditions been undisturbed by changes and fears of changes, there is no reason to doubt that this increase would have been realized. But the McKinley act became a law on October 1, 1890. Higher duties were imposed and customs receipts decreased with importations. Notwithstanding the extraordinary number and amount of purchases by importers in 1890 just prior to the enactment of the new law, to take advantage of the old rates the receipts for the year ending June 30, 1891, fell off ten millions, and for the year following amounted to only one hundred and seventy-seven millions, or four millions less than in 1885. Moreover, despite the fact that the early part of the last fiscal year was a time of unusual business activity, the receipts barely reached two hundred and three millions, whereas in the ordinary course of increase indicated by the steady advance from 1885 to 1890 they would have exceeded two hundred and fifty millions under the lower duties imposed by the old tariff.

I mention these facts merely to show the fallacy of the argument that an income tax or any other extraordinary method of obtaining money is made necessary by a reduction of duties. If the experience of the past eight years affords any criterion, just the reverse is true.

In fact, I am not aware that anybody seriously contends that such reductions as are recommended by this bill would ultimately result in smaller receipts. The only objection yet raised is that time would be required to adapt trade to the changed conditions, while the needs of the Government are pressing and must be met at once. On that point I need only say, what every business man knows, that importations and the consequent customs receipts have been reduced to a minimum since it became certain that the duties were to be lowered, just as in 1890 they were increased to the maximum when it was known that the duties were to be raised. The moment the new schedules are placed upon the statute books the flood of importations, which have been held back in anticipation of more favorable rates, will pour into our ports, and receipts at the custom-houses will be swelled accordingly. To attempt an accurate estimate of the extent of such an increase in revenue is a manifest impossibility, but that it can not fail to be very large is certain.

We come now to the question of internal revenue, and here, as the probabilities are less conjectural than in regard to customs receipts, so is the lack of necessity of income taxation more apparent. In an article recently published, Edward Atkinson shows more clearly than has been demonstrated hitherto the exact relation of population to consumption of whisky, beer, and tobacco. He finds that from 1879 to 1893 the revenue from whisky increased from 98 cents to $1.41 per capita, and the revenue from beer from 21 to 48 cents per capita. The revenue from tobacco has varied because of the changes in rates, but has ranged from 47 to 54 cents per capita. Taking all together, the average per capita per year from 1879 to 1893 was $2.51. But the average for the year 1893 was $2.65, the computed population being 66,826,000. The internal taxes on banks, oleomargarine, etc., amounted to 10 and the miscellaneous permanent receipts to 34 cents per capita, making a total of $3.09 per capita for 1893.

Figuring on the same percentage of increase in consumption which was made from 1879 to 1893, assuming no increase in revenue from whisky because of the apprehension that 20 cents per gallon additional may encourage fraudulent distillation and the possibility of large quantities of whisky being kept in bond through the next fiscal year, but allowing for the normal increase in the consumption of beer, for the additional receipts from playing cards and from lower duties on tobacco, the per capita revenue for the year ending June 30, 1895, will be $3.25, or 16 cents more than for the last fiscal year. Estimating the population at 70,600,000, Mr. Atkinson forecasts with reason a revenue from these sources of $230,000,000.

Accepting these estimates as approximately correct, the receipts for the year ending June 30, 1895, will be:

Internal revenue from taxes on liquors, tobacco, banks, oleomargarine, playing cards, from sales of public lands, and miscellaneous sources, and from customs duties on liquors and tobacco		$230,000,000
Customs duties upon all articles except liquors and tobacco		179,000,000
Total revenue		409,000,000
Expenditures:
For legislative, Treasury, civil departments, support of Army and Navy, and completion of vessels, postal deficiency, Indians, and public works, including river and harbor appropriations (estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury)	$175,000,000
Interest on the public debt, including that on recent loan	29,000,000
Pensions (Mr. Atkinson's estimate)	135,000,000
Total expenditures		339,000,000
Receipts over expenditures		70,000,000

I can see no business reason why, under ordinary circumstances, these anticipations might not be realized. But the peculiar existing conditions must be taken into account. A considerable period of time will undoubtedly be required to regain the trade which has been lost during the recent depression of business, lack of employment, and the consequent scarcity of money among workingmen, will diminish for some months to come the normal increase in the consumption of tobacco and beverages, and necessary and proper pruning of the pension list must be done with painstaking care.

Making ample allowance for all these conditions, the account will stand about as follows:

Ordinary expenditures (likely to be less rather than more)		$175,000,000
Interest		29,000,000
Pensions (granting the accuracy of the Treasury estimate of $162,000,000 for the present fiscal year and figuring on that basis)		150,000,000
Total expenditures		354,000,000
Receipts:
Internal revenue from sources mentioned above, and customs duties on liquors and tobacco	$214,000,000
Other customs	160,000,000
Total receipts		374,000,000
Leaving a margin of receipts over expenditures of		20,000,000

There is no reason whatever for apprehension that, under the proposed tariff measure, the total receipts will fall below this amount. Under the old tariff, with a much smaller population, they amounted to three hundred and seventy-one millions in 1887; three hundred and seventy-nine millions in 1888; three hundred and eighty-seven millions in 1889; four hundred and three millions in 1890, and three hundred and ninety-two millions in 1891, despite the prohibitive nature of the McKinley act. Is there any reasonable doubt that they will reach or exceed three hundred and seventy-four millions in 1895? Or, on the other hand, considering the estimates presented, is there any excuse for expenditures exceeding three hundred and fifty-four millions? If not, a margin of twenty millions will be allowed for mistakes in calculations and unforeseen contingencies for the next fiscal year, which I suppose all will admit is quite sufficient.

I have not gone deeply into the details of this phase of the subject, because of my lack of that knowledge and experience in dealing with the relations of national receipts to national expenditures which is essential to the proper performance of that task. But sufficient corroboration of these figures is afforded by the confession of the chairman of the Finance Committee that the excess of revenue under this measure will correspond almost exactly to the amount which he hopes to raise by the income tax.

It seems to me, therefore, a plain business proposition that any amount of money raised by this tax will serve no other purpose than that of forming a surplus in the National Treasury of no use to anybody and a constant temptation to extravagance on the part of legislators who cater to the prejudices of the so-called "debtor classes." If this really be the case, the tax is not only unnecessary, but a positive menace to safe, conservative, and economical administration of the Government.

It is unjust. Unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation. That is the creed of the Democratic party and of a vast majority of the American people. That the income tax is unnecessary and consequently unjust is proven, not alone by the facts which I have pointed out, but by the confession of its friends, voiced by the Senator from Indiana.

But the injustice of this provision is by no means dependent upon lack of necessity. It is inherent. Discrimination between classes or individuals in apportioning the burdens of government is manifestly unjust. And that this scheme does make such discrimination in the most wanton manner does not admit of question. As between individuals it exempts the man who earns $75 a week and taxes the man who earns $80 a week. Then, if by harder work he can increase his income to $100 a week, he must pay $24 for the privilege, and ever thereafter one-fiftieth part of all that he receives in excess of $4,000.

Why the line was drawn at $4,000 was, I confess, a mystery to me until one of its advocates in the House of Representatives said that it was necessary to fix it at less than $5,000 in order that members of Congress should not be exempt. If this be the real reason I can not forbear expressing the hope that those actuated by it err in their estimate of their own standing with the people. Unstable, indeed, must be the rock of popular opinion which supports a Senator or Representative who frankly admits that his motives would be called into question by his constituents on a pretext so flimsy as this. But it must be noted that recognition of the principle does not involve serious sacrifice. Twenty dollars a year is considered sufficient to satisfy the most critical.

I fail to see why ten or even five would not have served this patriotic purpose quite as well. Surely the amount to be paid is a matter of little moment, because if $4,000 a year is enough to support a family in luxury all truly unselfish statesmen should be glad to so adjust the tax as to enable them to contribute $1,000 instead of a paltry twenty-dollar bill. Possibly, however, it was thought that this object could be more easily accomplished by reducing the salaries of Senators and Representatives to the $4,000 luxury line. If so, I do not hesitate to promise my vote for a bill to that effect.

One fact is certain. Whatever of logic or fairness or wisdom there may be in the theory of an income tax is wholly eliminated by this absurd limit. It is neither the one thing nor the other. From the standpoint of those who honestly contend that this method may afford equitable taxation it is obviously too high. If every citizen is to bear the burden of government in proportion to his earnings, there is surely no reason why he who receives $3,500 a year should escape, while his neighbor earning $4,500 must pay.

This truth is recognized by foreign governments, which exempt only nominal incomes. In England all exceeding $750 are taxed, in Prussia all exceeding $225, in Denmark all exceeding $215, and in Austria all exceeding $113.80. In our own country, when seventy-three millions were raised, only incomes of less than $600 were exempt. For what purpose the minimum is now increased to $4,000, unless to protect Congressmen from invidious remarks for a very reasonable sum, is inconceivable. Four thousand dollars is 5 per cent interest on a capital of $80,000, 4 per cent on $100,000, or 3 per cent on $133,333. Either of these sums is considered a large fortune in ninety-nine one-hundredths of the towns and villages of the country. To the farmer it is opulence. Let the debtor-class representatives submit this proposition to their constituents, and ask if it is in accordance with their ideas that an idle man worth $133,000 shall be exempt while another earning $5,000 a year by hard work must pay.

On the other hand, if this tax is really designed, as claimed, to bear only upon surplus wealth, the limit is too small. To be consistent, only those Congressmen who save a thousand dollars a year from their salaries should vote for it, and I, for one, should be quite willing to subject the measure to this test, and abide by the result. If this tax is aimed at multimillionaires, the sights should be readjusted. As they stand now, not more than one in ten of those who will be reached makes more than a comfortable living. This statement may be disputed. In fact, it has been.

"We contend," says one, "that $4,000 a year is sufficient to enable any family to live in comfort, and upon an accumulation in excess of this why should not the hands of the taxgatherer be laid when the Government has enabled him to accumulate that wealth?"

Conditions, it seems, are not to be considered. The difference between the cost of living in New York and the cost of living at a country cross-roads plays no part in the fixing of this limit. Four thousand dollars is as much as anybody ought to spend. That is the verdict of the oracle of the Four Corners, and it is final. True, one man may be obliged by the conditions surrounding him to pay twice as much for rent as another, and possibly 20 per cent more for the necessaries of life, or he may have to clothe and educate a large family, while the other has only himself to care for—it makes no difference. There must be a limit somewhere, and it is fixed at $4,000. Upon any amount in excess of that sum "the hands of the taxgatherer shall be laid." Why? Because "the Government has enabled him to accumulate that wealth."

Does it never occur to the income-taxer that the Government afforded precisely the same facilities to the other man who did not accumulate that wealth? I suppose nobody will insist that the Government actually made the money, because, if it had, the other would have been equally well supplied. The individual must have had something to do with it. He may have been more thrifty, more honest, more sober, more capable. But it matters not how he attained a position to command an income of more than $4,000. He has the money, and because he has it, and for no other reason under heaven, he must pay another's debt to the Government. Is that "just and right?" Done by an individual without sanction of law, it would be called highway robbery. And no act of Congress can change the character of the deed. Can we reconcile its performance to our sense of fairness and duty simply because we are more fortunate than the highwayman and have the power to act without fear of being sent to prison?

Champions of the tax deny that it is sectional in purpose. That it is in effect is impossible of denial. The total amount raised by this method from 1863 to 1873, inclusive, was $353,341,293. Of this New England paid $61,527,086, or 18.4 per cent. The Middle States—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, and the District of Columbia—paid $177,985,011, or 53.4 per cent—more than one-half of the entire amount. The thirteen Southern States paid $18,761,073, or 5.6 per cent. The twenty Western States and Territories paid $34,024,229, or 19.2 per cent. And the Pacific Slope, comprising California, Oregon, Washington, and Alaska, paid $11,032,993, or 3.4 per cent. New Jersey alone paid more than Indiana, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Colorado combined. Eliminating Kentucky only, New Jersey paid more than all of the twelve Southern States. New York paid more than all of the Western States and Territories, all of the Southern States, and all of the Pacific States combined.

In 1867 a single collection district in New York paid more than the five great Western States of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, and more than twice as much as Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia combined.

The total number of persons assessed in 1867 was 259,385. Of these more than 50 per cent were citizens of five States—New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Pennsylvania.

I grant that the impoverishment of the South at that time and the rapid development of both the South and West since then make it probable that the disproportion would not be so great now under the same law. But that law taxed all incomes of more than $1,000. Possibly this is the reason why the limit had been raised to $4,000. Whatever the cause, the effect is certain. Under the $4,000 provision the Middle States would again pay more than 50 per cent of the total tax, New England as much as the whole West, and the South less than 6 per cent.

There is but one way by which the law could be made more sectional in practice. That is, by taxing the citizens of the Middle and New England States and exempting all others. The one course is as just as the other, for the results would be substantially the same. The only difference lies in technical construction of the Constitution.

But we are told that the unselfish patriots who are driving this bill through Congress deplore the injection of sectionalism into the discussion.

"Is this unfair?" cries Mr. Hall in the Forum. "Does it justify raising the sectional question? Is it we of the West and South who raise it?"

Well, let us see who has raised it if not "we of the West and South." Who is responsible for the proposition? Did any Eastern member have anything to do with its introduction or its adoption by the Ways and Means Committee? On the contrary, did not every Eastern Democratic committeeman and leader protest against the interjection of a sectional provision into the party policy at this time? Would the scheme ever have been mentioned except by Populists in the House of Representatives if "we of the West and South" had not forced it upon the Committee of Ways and Means?

What does the vote indicate? For reasons best known to themselves the majority refused to submit the income tax to a separate test and the vote was taken on the internal-revenue amendment as a whole. One hundred and eighty-two Representatives voted aye. By geographical divisions this vote was as follows:

Southern States: Texas, 13; West Virginia, 4; North Carolina, 8; Mississippi, 7; Missouri, 13; Alabama, 9; Kentucky, 10; Georgia, 11; Louisiana, 3; Arkansas, 6; Virginia, 9; Tennessee, 8; Florida, 2; South Carolina, 5. Total, 108.

Western States: Kansas, 5; Minnesota, 4; Wisconsin, 6; Illinois, 12; Nebraska, 3; Indiana, 11; Wyoming, 1; Michigan, 5; Montana, 1; Iowa, 1; South Dakota, 1; Idaho, 1; Colorado, 2; California, 5; Ohio, 11. Total, 69.

Middle States: Pennsylvania, 3. Total, 3.

New England: Massachusetts, 1; Connecticut, 1. Total, 2.

There was no vote in favor of the income tax from New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, or Rhode Island. One hundred and seventy-seven from the South and West; five from New England and the Middle States—that is the record. I mention it merely to show that, not only did the South and West propose and insist upon this tax, but the South and West passed it unaided in the House of Representatives. What absurdity, then, to accuse the East of raising the sectional question? The East not only did not raise it, but did not want it, and protested against it. The sectional issue is forced upon us. The whole proceeding is nothing else than the exercise of tyranny by a chance majority over a minority. Because we of the East have accumulated and are accumulating money by hard work we must stand and deliver. And such a policy, I say with the utmost respect for mistaken judgment, but frankly and plainly to those who err willfully, is more than unjust. It is positively dishonest and wholly discreditable.

It is unsuccessful. I have examined with some care the arguments on this point which have been advanced by the advocates of the tax, and, although I find many assertions iterated and reiterated, I have been unable thus far to discover any actual facts to confirm their position. Indeed, the most striking feature of the debate in the House of Representatives was the support given to the proposition on the ground that Great Britain had demonstrated its practicability by the very men who, in the recent silver discussion, denounced as hateful and un-American every kind of English legislation. But it would be a waste of time to dwell upon the paradoxical absurdity of arguments which flatly contradict each other. Such utterances may be necessary to satisfy prejudices which produce votes, but even when, as in this case, they can be turned against their makers, they are unworthy of the attention of the Senate of the United States.

It is not surprising, however, that believers in the income tax should turn their attention to England. There, if anywhere, it should be successful. The area of territory subject to supervision is small, sources of income are well known, and the officials charged with the execution of the law have no political advantage to gain through leniency. And yet the sole fact advanced to establish its success is that the revenue from the present tax amounts to $66,000,000. These figures make a deep and abiding impression upon the minds of debtor-class representatives. They show what can be done in another country, and seem to whet appetites for more in the United States. But the amount of revenue proves nothing. If it did, the fact that our own customs produced more than two hundred millions last year would stamp that system as ideal. The question is not how much was collected, but how much was not collected that should have been.

On this point the figures prove little except that in 1883, when the total of incomes must have been much smaller and the tax was only one-half pence per pound greater, the total revenue actually obtained was only about 500,000 pounds less than in 1893. Again, in 1886, when the tax was only 1 pence greater, the revenue exceeded that of last year by 2,500,000 pounds. All of which simply goes to prove that either the incomes of Englishmen have diminished or the tax is yearly becoming less collectible. So far as the figures count at all, they count against the successful enforcement of the tax.

But granting, as I have already done, that they afford little basis for sound judgment, we have a far more important factor in the expressions of those who have studied its operation. And most important and most pertinent of all these was the admission last year of the chancellor of the exchequer, who surely had no political reason for decrying a measure for which he was in no small degree responsible, that less than one-third of the incomes paid the tax. There is expert testimony based upon actual observation and execution of the law. Now, if, in a country most compact and best adapted of all in the world for the successful enforcement of this law, in a country whose people had become accustomed to the exaction and whose organization for its collection had been perfecting for half a century, less than one-third of the incomes paid the tax, what proportion, may I ask, would be likely to pay in this country, whose Constitution prohibits direct taxation, whose people have never tolerated it except in time of war, and whose official machinery is clogged with politics?

Against such evidence as I have instanced and as appears in the astonishing estimates of evasions in every report of the British commissioners of inland revenue, the advocates of this measure advance the fact that it has been retained by Mr. Gladstone throughout his long and honorable career. But, despite occasional words in extenuation in some of his many-sided utterances, Mr. Gladstone never approved of the tax. His most intimate knowledge of its workings was obtained when he was chancellor of the exchequer, and while he held this position he not only declared in a speech, "I believe it does more than any other tax to demoralize and corrupt the people," but in his financial statement, regretting his inability to abolish it, he said:

> I think that some happier chancellor of the exchequer may achieve this great accomplishment, and that some future poet may be able to sing to him—
>
> "He took the tax away,
> And built himself an everlasting name."

That neither his judgment nor his ambition changed with experience is shown by the fact that twenty years later he sought the suffrages of the people on the distinct declaration that he contemplated a repeal of the tax. That he did not eventually "take the tax away" was due not to his belief that it was just or wise, but to the conditions of the British Government which made its abolishment practically impossible.

These conditions exist to day, not in Great Britain alone, but in a yet more aggravated form in Germany, Austria, and Italy. And that is the reason, the only reason, why the tax is tolerated in those countries. Their needs for the maintenance of great armies and navies are so great and their resources are so small that they can not do without it. France had practical experience with direct taxation under the House of Bourbon, and the result was revolution and anarchy. It was a bitter lesson, but so well heeded that despite the vicissitudes of the past century and the oft-recurring needs of large sums of money, no general income tax has been imposed. Russia, too, has become rich enough to abandon it.

Great Britain, Germany, Austria, and Italy—these are the shining lights of the income-taxers, one of whom in the House of Representatives had the hardihood to assert that, "so far from being unpopular in Great Britain, it has become more and more popular all the time." I should like to see the evidence upon which this assertion is based. The sole merit claimed for the scheme is that it benefits the poor—by robbing the rich, to be sure—but still accomplishing the result. Does it? To what extent have the poor been benefited in England, where, according to Joseph Chamberlain, 50 per cent of the workingmen who attain the age of 60 are "almost certain to come upon the poor law for subsistence," and, according to Canon Blackley, "half our working people, if they reach 60 years of age, are doomed to die as paupers"? Or in Germany, or in Austria, or in Italy.

It is a well-known fact that the condition of the workingmen of France is far superior to that of men of the same class in any other Continental country. That this is due chiefly to advantage of climate and soil and habits of industry and frugality, I admit. But how do the masses of any of these countries compare in any respect with our own people, who have raised their revenues by customs and dispensed with the system of taxation which has "benefited the poor" and proved so "popular" recently, let us say in Sicily? The advocates of direct taxation who dwell upon the misery of the Western farmers will do well to omit references to peoples who are bankrupt as nations and struggling for very existence as individuals. Such comparisons are as odious as the tax itself.

It is far more sensible and in better accord with what we consider American ideas to analyze our own experience with this method of taxation. The necessities arising from the war of the rebellion forced us to adopt it as a temporary expedient in 1862. The results were wholly unsatisfactory at first, but frequent amendments finally produced a revenue from all sources of seventy-three millions in 1866. That was the high-water mark. From that time until 1873, when the law was repealed, the amount raised dwindled steadily until hardly five millions were collected.

What caused this astonishing diminution of receipts? Advocates of the tax say that it was due wholly to changes in the per cent of tax and exemptions. Let us see. The revenues by fiscal years were as follows:

1863	$22,741,358.25	1869	$34,791,855.84
1864	20,294,731.74	1870	37,775,873.62
1865	32,050,017.44	1871	19,162,650.75
1866	72,982,150.03	1872	14,436,861.78
1867	66,014,429.34	1873	5,062,311.62
1868	41,455,598.36

The claim of the income-taxers that the variation in revenue arose from the changes in the law is confirmed by results only while imminent danger confronted the Union. The revenues of twenty and thirty-two millions, respectively, in 1864 and 1865, were raised on a total tax of 8 per cent on all incomes exceeding $600, and 10 per cent on incomes exceeding $10,000. The increase of twelve millions under the same law was no more than natural. Official machinery for collection of the tax was being perfected, and the patriotism of the North responded to the obvious necessity of the Government.

Then the tax was changed to 5 per cent on all incomes exceeding $600 and 10 per cent on all exceeding $5,000. This produced seventy-three millions.

In the following year the tax was reduced to 5 per cent on incomes exceeding $1,000, and finally, in 1872, to 2½ per cent on incomes exceeding $2,000. But the diminution in revenue did not correspond to the decrease in rate. Granting, for the sake of the argument, that it was wholly attributable to changes when changes were made, what caused the decrease of nearly fifteen millions from 1867 to 1868, of nearly seven millions from 1868 to 1869, of nearly five millions from 1871 to 1872, and of more than nine millions from 1872 to 1873 under precisely the same laws?

The tide turned in 1866. Up to that time the people recognized the great necessities of the Government in its struggle to preserve the Union, and were willing to submit to exactions for its support. The payment of the tax was recognized as a patriotic duty. But as soon as it became certain that the Union was saved, and that extraordinary, inquisitorial, and hateful methods of taxation were no longer necessary, they refused to pay. That is the true and only explanation of the decrease in revenue from 1867 to 1868, from 1868 to 1869, and from 1871 to 1872. What other, indeed, is possible when there was no change in the law?

Evasion of taxes which had become unnecessary and, consequently, odious to the American mind, was not only tolerated, but openly countenanced by the people themselves. David A. Wells, than whom there is no higher living authority upon such subjects, and who, as Special Commissioner of Internal Revenue at that time, had every facility for acquiring accurate information, says plainly that—

> Those only who were officially and intimately connected at this time with the Internal Revenue Department of the United States Treasury can form any adequate idea of the amount of perjury and fraud that characterized and pervaded the country during the years 1867-1872, as the outcome of the then existing system of internal revenue. And American ingenuity was never more strikingly illustrated—not even by the exhibits of the Patent Office—than it was at that time in devising and successfully carrying out methods for evading taxes on incomes.

It is gratifying, no doubt, to assume that no citizen will lose an opportunity to pay the last cent of taxation imposed upon him by the statutes. But we are living in America, not in Arcadia; and, unfortunately, there is no warrant for the hope that the nature of man has changed materially in the last thirty years.

There is certainly no more enlightened or patriotic State in the Union than Massachusetts. Nor is there one, in the language of Mr. Wells, whose administration of tax laws is more "stringent and arbitrary." Every possible facility is afforded those charged with the collection of income taxes in Boston. And yet, according to trustworthy authority, "only about one-fourth of what is due the city from incomes" is collected.

Moreover, as an indication of the complacency with which the people view evasions of such a law, Mr. Wells cites a memorial signed by representative business men, who frankly declare that "although the market value of shares of foreign corporations held by citizens of Boston alone is known to be over $600,000,000, the amount taxed is estimated at only $45,000,000, and nearly all of this is taxed to the unfortunate people whose estates are in trust."

Is it any wonder that the signers of this memorial pronounced the law "ineffective" and "ridiculous"?

There is no need to pursue this phase of the subject further. Enough has been shown of the practical working of this system, both abroad and at home, a generation ago and to-day, to prove its utter inefficiency. Only the unfounded assertions of its advocates make necessary, for the sake of contradiction, the presentation of the facts which have been given.

The simple fact that the tax is unnecessary should be sufficient evidence that it can not prove successful. Say what we may of the devotion of American citizens to the decrees of their Government, there is not a Senator in this Chamber who does not know that they will feel quite justified in evading by every possible method the payment of a tax which they know to be unnecessary and consider offensive. It is easy to talk of the power of the law over a law-abiding people. But everybody who has had anything to do with enforcement knows that the power of the law fades into insignificance when confronted by the greater power of public sentiment. Every Northern city bears testimony to this fact in the disregard of excise regulations forced upon it by rural legislators. Every Southern State is living evidence of the impotence of "mailed hands" of oppression. Only last month liquor-selling South Carolina joined hands with prohibition Maine in demonstrating that the American people place their individual rights above the acts of any body of representatives.

What, then, can be expected in this case from the thousands of citizens who would resent this law as an infringement upon their liberties, as an inquisition into their personal affairs, and as an imposition upon their accomplishment?

It is unpopular. That it has no supporters in the East needs no demonstration. The press, regardless of political affiliations, is, with a single exception, united in opposition, and in this instance at least every Eastern member of Congress knows that the people are in accord with the press. But it is urged that the East has become a very small factor in the country and in the Government, and that the people in the South and West are equally unanimous in its favor. I dispute that assumption. A majority might or might not declare for an income tax if an opportunity should offer itself for a direct vote upon this proposition alone. But no man can tell what they would do, and the only indication yet afforded of their wishes does not warrant the belief that they would accept it. In the latest national campaign there was no mention of the income tax in either the Democratic or the Republican platform. The Populist platform adopted at Omaha on July 4, however, contained the distinct declaration:

> We demand a graduated income tax.

It is true that other issues were involved, but there was nothing to offset a strong popular desire for this measure. On the contrary, the Populist platform alone contained other demands, such as the free coinage of silver and an increase of currency, which would attract rather than repel the people of the South and West. What was the result? In a total vote of 12,154,542, 1,122,045 ballots were cast for the Populist candidates. In the electoral college Gen. Weaver received 22 ballots out of a total of 444. These votes were divided as follows: Colorado, 4; Idaho, 3; Kansas, 10; Nevada, 3; North Dakota, 1; Oregon, 1. It would be absurd to maintain that the result in Colorado, Idaho, and Nevada was due to any except the silver issue. But, disregarding that fact, it must be remembered that there were no Democratic candidates for electors in either Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, or North Dakota. The people united in a protest against Republican misrule openly in these States and tacitly in Nevada, which gave only 716 votes to the Democratic candidates. Moreover, the only anti-Republican candidate elected in Oregon was on both the Democratic and Populist tickets. Not a single State, therefore, was carried and not a single electoral vote was obtained on the income-tax proposition.

If there remains any doubt on this point, the truth is readily ascertained by referring to the States where there was no fusion and consequently no possibility of misinterpretation of the actual causes of the results. Take any of the States whose Representatives in Congress supported the tax. As neither the Democratic nor the Republican platform favored the plan, it would be only fair to combine the votes for Cleveland and Harrison against those for Weaver. But make the comparison on the vote for Mr. Cleveland alone. What is the result? In Alabama the vote was 138,138 for Cleveland to 85,181 for Weaver; in Arkansas, 87,834 to 11,831; in Florida, 30,143 to 4,843; in Georgia, 129,361 to 42,397; in Indiana, 262,740 to 22,208; in Iowa, 196,367 to 20,595; in Kentucky, 175,461 to 23,500; in Mississippi, 40,237 to 10,256; in Missouri, 268,398 to 41,213; in North Carolina, 132,951 to 44,736; in Ohio, 404,115 to 14,850; in South Carolina, 54,692 to 2,407; in Tennessee, 138,874 to 23,477; in Texas, 239,148 to 99,648. In these States there was an opportunity to vote for tariff reform with an income tax or for tariff reform without an income tax, and the people were so little attracted by the proposition that all combined throughout the entire Union gave Gen. Weaver a smaller total vote than the total vote of New York State alone.

It may be, as I have said, that since that time a majority in these States have been led to believe that this method of making others pay their taxes would benefit themselves, but it is very evident that they did not so believe two years ago, and they have had no opportunity to reverse their judgment since that time. If the advocates of this measure are as confident that the people demand it as they pretend to be, they have nothing to fear from such an expression of opinion as may be obtained at the next Congressional elections. But, in the face of the verdict of two years ago, they have no right to make an assumption which can not fail to discredit their own people in the minds of all right-thinking men. For my part, I firmly believe that the people of the South and West are ready and willing to bear their fair proportion of the burdens of government, and I can not be convinced to the contrary until by the casting of their own ballots they leave no room for doubt.

It is un-Democratic. From the day on which the Democratic party sprang into existence to the present time it has steadfastly opposed this method of taxation. Thomas Jefferson enunciated the principle upon which this opposition is based when he said:

To take from one because it is thought that his own industry or that of his father has acquired too much, in order to spare others who or whose fathers have not exercised equal industry and skill, is to violate arbitrarily the first principles of association, the guaranty to every one of a free exercise of his industry and the fruits acquired by it.

The people approved this sentiment, the party accepted it, and in the first Democratic administration of the Government, while Thomas Jefferson occupied the President's chair, the tax was abolished. During the many succeeding periods of Democratic rule a return to the system was never contemplated. Even during the civil war, when, if ever, it was necessary, the party as an organization opposed its adoption, and as late as 1884, when, for the first time in a generation, a Democratic President was elected, the platform of the party contained the distinct declaration that "from the foundation of the Government taxes collected at the custom-houses have been the chief source of Federal revenues, and such they must continue to be."

Against this declaration must be placed that of the chief advocate of the tax in the House of Representatives, who, when asked when the Democratic party had pledged itself to this tax, replied:

I will say that I have always said in every speech that an income tax was just and right. The platform in my district pledged me to it. I maintain that when the Democratic platform adopted at Chicago declared that a protective tariff was robbery and unconstitutional, it laid the ground for some form of direct taxation such as this. Let us wipe away the robber and unconstitutional tariff, and that brings us to the income tax as a logical result of that platform.

Mr. President, as a Democrat and a member of that convention, I repudiate any such interpretation of the platform of 1892. The Democratic party is not a free-trade party, and the mere fact that an insignificant number of free-trade theorists have engrafted themselves upon it can not make it so. "Taxes collected at the custom-houses have been the chief source of Federal revenue, and such they must continue to be." Nor can the utterance of a Congressional convention in Missouri, nor the assertion of its candidate that an income tax is "just and right," controvert a principle declared by Thomas Jefferson and affirmed by every national convention since the organization of the party.

I have already pointed out the fact that there was no hint of an income tax in the Democratic platform of 1892, and have shown its unpopularity by analyzing the vote for the Populist candidates. I take this opportunity to free myself from any possible charge of misrepresentation. For the moment I had forgotten that the income-tax proposition was incribed upon the banners of yet another political organization. I refer to the Socialist party, which also "demanded" a "progressive income tax, the smaller incomes to be exempt." Upon that and other issues of like character Mr. Wing won the suffrages of his fellow-citizens to the extent of 21,191 votes out of a total of 12,154,542. These may be added to those given to Gen. Wever in the analysis which has preceded.

But, sir, if we accept the assertions of some of the advocates of this proposition, these 21,191 citizens are entitled to a consideration which is not warranted by their numerical strength. "I tell you," says one, "when you oppose a measure of this kind, when you come to the great masses of the people and say that the wealthy of this Government shall bear none of its burdens, then you make a foundation for the argument of anarchy, socialism, and demagogy that eventually will sweep back and curse this country, as it did in France in the days of the French revolution."

Has it come to this, Mr. President, that the most prosperous, most tolerant, but withal the most powerful nation on earth must throw a sop to anarchy, socialism, and demagogy? When the pauper-ridden nations of Europe have just shown their capacity to meet and master this cowardly curse of modern civilization, shall free America grant the necessity of concession?

And where, may I ask, if begun, shall such concession end? An income tax of 2 per cent can only serve to whet the appetite of insatiate socialism. What next? The free silver coinage and subtreasury plans of the Populists or the abolition of Presidency, Vice-Presidency, and Senate, demanded by the Socialists? A 2 per cent tax will appear, as the Senator from Indiana has said, "a very small and trifling matter compared to others more serious." What are those others more serious? And how soon must they be expected? If we are really confronted by the specter of communism, we may as well understand the situation that we may be prepared to meet it. Do those who indulge in these vague premonitions of social disaster really appreciate and believe the full meaning of their words? Or are they willing to take the risk of encouraging incendiarism only in order to carry their point? Which position do they wish to assume—that of promoters of disorder and class hatred, or of demagogues eager to curry favor with the physically indolent and mentally depraved?

This is not Democracy. It is cowardice and folly. If disapproval of such a tendency involves the reproachful designation of "Conservative," then I am a Conservative. The true Democratic party stands to-day between and above the class rapacity and greed engendered by Republican legislation and the unbridled license and unreasoning prejudice of the unsuccessful. It is charged with the responsibility of preventing, by the exercise of wisdom, prudence, and courage, the clash of these opposing elements. And it has the power to perform its full duty, because behind it, greater and stronger than all other forces combined, is the sturdy common sense of the American people.

It would be as distinctly a betrayal of trust to yield to the one element as to yield to the other. The Democratic party has no better right to tax the few for the benefit of the many than to tax the many for the benefit of the few. And yet that and nothing else is the avowed purpose of this proposition.

Shall it stand? Shall Democracy assume now for the first time, without a semblance of authority from the people, the burden of class legislation and the responsibility for incitement to class hatred?

"All hail the counsels of Thomas Jefferson," said the Senator from Indiana. And so say I.

To take from one because it is thought that his own industry or that of his father has acquired too much, in order to spare others who or whose fathers have not exercised equal industry and skill, is to violate arbitrarily the first principles of association.

That is the counsel of Thomas Jefferson. And that is Democracy. A tax upon 85,000 out of 70,000,000 is a flat contradiction of this principle. And, I repeat with emphasis, it is undemocratic.

It is un-American. Fifty years ago, Lord John Russell, commenting upon the proposal to reimpose the income tax in Great Britain, said:

To resort to the desperate measure of an income tax is nothing less than to proclaim to the world that your resources are exhausted, and that indirect taxation has reached its limits. France, in all her struggles, has never resorted to an income tax, because her people are more imbued with the spirit of liberty than any other nation in Europe. An income tax is an incongruous incorporation into our Government of the fiscal methods of political systems with which ours has nothing in common and against which ours is, or ought to be, an emblazoned protest before the world. It has had its origin in the necessities of military government; and it has been tolerated because the necessities of war have been held more sacred than the rights of liberty. Its precedents are those of tyrannies; its methods are a counterpart of the violences of the Inquisition. Herein lies the instinctive revolt of the American citizen against this form of tax.

The English statesman of 1842, recalling the effect of the stamp act of 1765 and the abolition of income taxation, under the leadership of Thomas Jefferson, had a clearer understanding of the temper of the American people than some of our own statesmen seem to possess to-day. He spoke truly and accurately when he declared that it had been tolerated only where "the necessities of war" were held "more sacred than the rights of liberty," that "its methods are a counterpart of the violences of the Inquisition," and that—I wish to emphasize these words—"herein lies the instinctive revolt of the American citizen to this form of tax."

How did it happen that at this early day it was a recognized fact in other countries that the American citizen does "instinctively revolt" against a direct tax upon his earnings? Here was a distinct national characteristic so well understood that it was held up as an example to other governments less fortunate. Could it have been due to any other condition than that of "instinctive revolt" against any restraint upon individual liberty and freedom of action, such as gave birth to the Declaration of Independence and has been emphasized certainly in every Democratic platform from the days of Jefferson to the present time?

The assumption of Lord Russell was fully justified by the fact that we had eliminated this method from our system of taxation at the very beginning of independent government. But there was another warrant for the assertion, quite as important and quite as explicit, in the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "no capitation or direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration."

It is difficult for a layman to understand what form of taxation can be more "direct" than a tax upon that which a man earns or receives from his earnings. It is yet more difficult to see how a tax upon 85,000 persons out of 70,000,000 can be "laid in proportion to the census or enumeration." It is not my purpose, and nobody knows better than myself that it is not within the range of my abilities, to discuss the constitutionality of this or any other measure. But the fact can not be overlooked that there has been a wide divergence of opinion on this point, not only among leaders at the bar, but so far as the principle involved in income taxation is concerned, in the Supreme Court itself. It is true that on one occasion that great tribunal declared that an income tax was not at variance with this provision of the Constitution, but on another it said plainly:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals * * * is none the less robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

One does not need to be a lawyer to understand that. It does not matter whether the number of favored individuals be small or great—whether they be the few who profit by the existing tariff or the many who think they may be benefited by a tax upon incomes. It is the discrimination which "is none the less robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation." And it is the discrimination which is the most offensive and un-American feature of this scheme.

But there is another solemn declaration of the Supreme Court which bears even more directly upon a very pronounced characteristic of this proposition. It is this:

> Any compulsory discovery, by extorting the party's oath or compelling the production of his private books and papers, to convict him of a crime or to forfeit his property, is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purposes of despotic power, but it can not abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom.

If the learned justice who wrote this opinion had been passing judgment upon the income-tax proposition now before us, he could not have spoken more explicity, for no conceivable law could more fully meet the requirements of his reprobation. It does openly and avowedly and in unmistakable language "extort the party's oath," and "compel the production of his private books and papers." And for what purpose, may I ask, if not to prove his evasion of the law or, in the more forceful diction of the Supreme Court, "to convict him of a crime"?

Such methods, our highest judicial tribunal declares, are "abhorrent to the instincts of an American," exactly as Lord Russell stated in 1842. They "may suit the purposes of despotic power," but they "can not abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom."

If I were a lawyer, accustomed to legal ways, I should not hesitate to rest my case upon this finding of the Supreme Court. No stronger condemnation of the contemplated inquisition could be put into words. No sharper denunciation of its un-Americanism could be desired.

And so I repeat that, despite the declaration of the Supreme Court that it is not contrary to the letter of our fundamental law, it is a contradiction of the theory and traditions of our national belief, directly opposed to the spirit of the Constitution itself, and as un-American as any direct tax that could be laid in defiance of the injunction that all shall be "in proportion to the census or enumeration."

It is unwise. Individual freedom from despotic and discriminative laws is the secret of American success. It is our chief attraction and chief advantage as a nation to-day. To eliminate in the slightest degree this dominant feature from our system of government is the height of folly. But that is precisely what this provision does.

I say it is despotic. Why? Because it puts it within the power of one man to publicly brand another man as a criminal before the law without trial by jury, sentence by judge, or any sort of hearing beyond that which he himself may consider fit and proper. I am not one of those who think that politics can be divorced from government. But I do believe that there is no immediate necessity of increasing the proportion of politics to business in governmental affairs, and that is what you do when you give to active politicians the power which is bestowed upon minor officials by this bill. Here is a sample paragraph:

> The deputy collector, or officer, or agent designated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall require every list or return to be verified by the oath or affirmation of the party rendering it, and may increase the amount of any list or return if he has reason to believe that the same is understated; and in case any such person having a taxable income shall neglect or refuse to make and render such list and return, or shall render a false or fraudulent list or return, it shall be the duty of the deputy collector, or officer, or agent designated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make such list according to the best information he can obtain, by the examination of such person, or his books, or accounts, or any other evidence, and to add 50 per cent as a penalty to the amount of the tax due on such list in all cases of willful neglect or refusal to make and render a list or return; and in all cases of a false or fraudulent list or return having been rendered to add 100 per cent as a penalty to the amount of tax ascertained to be due, the tax and the additions thereto as a penalty to be assessed and collected in the manner provided for in other cases of willful neglect or refusal to render a list or return, or of rendering a false or fraudulent return.

Neither the President of the United States, nor the Supreme Court, nor the Senate, nor the House of Representatives, nor all combined have authority equal to this. Understand: The deputy collector or agent, a local politician inevitably, "may increase the amount of any list or return if he has reason to believe that the same is understated." What "reason" is required to enable a representative of the United States to thus pronounce a citizen guilty of perjury? Only that which is sufficient unto himself. Nothing more. It may be the libel of a rival. It may be a personal grudge. It may be refusal to contribute to a campaign fund. The officer is the judge. And if he is not satisfied with a mere increase, or if the campaign contribution is not large enough he may, at his convenience, suspect fraud, and thereupon it "shall be his duty" to make a list to suit himself according to information obtained "by examination of such person, or his books or accounts or any other evidence, and to add 50 per cent," etc.

The deputy collector can do all this arbitrarily. There is no power under the law to prevent him from, or punish him for, doing a wrong either through ignorance or malice. The injured person may appeal to the agent's superior who appointed him and is responsible for his action, but that is all.

To say that such a law, giving another access to a man's accounts, books, and business secrets, is no more inquisitorial or objectionable than that which authorizes a customs inspector to search a trunk, is too absurd for serious consideration. And to say further that such information is perfectly guarded because the deputy collector is bound to secrecy, is not only confession of the citizen's right to privacy, but an utterly inadequate estimate of the average deputy collector's capacity for practical politics.

Prof. Amasa Walker has the correct idea. He does not attempt to deny the inquisition. He admits and upholds it. The business man, he argues, would derive a benefit from the necessity of keeping his accounts posted, and he could not mislead the argus-eyed collector because—I quote Prof. Walker's own words—"his neighbors and competitors have an eye upon him if they believe he is making false statements, and he can not long escape detection." Meanwhile, it is, of course, his duty as a citizen devoted to the best interests of his country to keep an eye upon the "neighbors and competitors in business" who are watching him. The wit of man could not devise a scheme better adapted to the practice of bribery on the one hand and of blackmail on the other. "Mind your own business" is a good American adage, and I can not believe that it is wise to give the sanction of law to "spy upon your neighbor" as a substitute.

But the creation even of a system of personal espionage from one end of the country to the other is by no means the most harmful of this bill's irresistible effects upon progress and development. A tax upon incomes is a tax upon industry, upon economy, upon brains, upon achievement. It not only provides for additional taxation without additional representation, but puts a premium upon dishonesty and evasion of the law. I care nothing for the mock heroics of those who insist that no punishment is too severe for a citizen who would try to avoid payment of taxes. You can not reform human nature by statute. Nor can you create and nourish patriotic sentiments by imposition. An attempt to do so by this or any other method of like nature can only engender class hatred and sectional distrust, and when you do that you restrict inevitably the development of the South and West, which is now being accomplished by the use of money from the East.

The public unwisdom of such a measure seems to be obvious. Of its political folly I shall say nothing at this time beyond this, that in my judgment its first effect will be to deprive the Democratic party of a governor in New York, a Senator from New Jersey, and 50 per cent of its present Eastern representation in the House of Representatives. If it is the desire of the advocates of this bill to drive every Eastern State into the Republican party, to encourage the Populists of the South and West to follow up their "entering wedge," and to practically eliminate the party of Jefferson from participation in public affairs, they can find no surer way to accomplish their purpose than that which they have chosen.

I have thus endeavored, Mr. President, to establish the justice and accuracy of the conclusions which I stated at the beginning.

I have shown from the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury and of Mr. Atkinson and by the open confession of the chairman of the Committee on Finance that a tax upon incomes is unnecessary.

I have shown from the bill itself and from the facts of history that it is sectional and unjust.

I have shown from our own experience and by the testimony of English financiers that it is unsuccessful.

I have shown by comparison of the latest vote for tariff reform with an income tax with the vote for tariff reform without an income tax that it is unpopular.

I have shown from the declaration of Thomas Jefferson and of every Democratic platform since the organization of the party that it is undemocratic.

I have shown that it is contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution, and therefore un-American.

I have shown that it is an unwarranted inquisition into the private affairs of individuals, a bar to progress and development, and therefore unwise.

I have only to say, in conclusion, that nobody regrets more earnestly than myself the necessity of touching upon the sectional character of this legislation. It has ever been my boast that the Republican party is the sectional party and that the organization to which I profess allegiance is free from bias of any kind. But the truth can not be ignored, and, to bring the full enormity of what they are doing home to my friends from the South, I ask them to consider a parallel proposition.

Suppose the colored voters of Mississippi or Alabama or any other State were in a majority in that State. Suppose they should elect a governor and a majority of both houses of the Legislature. Suppose they should then say, "The whites are rich; we are poor. They are more fortunate than we. They were born into freedom, we into slavery. They are blessed with the spirit of energy, thrift, and frugality; we are indolent and prodigal by nature. By virtue of their superior gifts, they have secured possession of property and have accumulated wealth. It is true that we were idle while they were at work, but the fact remains that they can afford to bear the burden of government and we can not. Therefore, we will tax the whites. We can not tax them because they are white, so we will tax their incomes. And we will fix the limit of exemption at such a figure that ten of them will be compelled to pay to one of us. It is just and right that wealth which receives a greater benefit from government than poverty, should bear the burden. But, right or wrong, it shall. We are in the majority. We have the power. The industrious and prosperous must pay the taxes of the indolent and unsuccessful."

How, let me ask my friends from the South, would you regard such a law as that? Would you consider that might makes right in that case as in this? Would you uphold as just the very method which you now pronounce ideal? Would you support the law? Would you denounce your neighbor for evading it? Would you scrupulously avoid evasion yourself? Would you cheerfully throw open your account books and disclose the condition of your private affairs? Would you, I say, receive the collector of such a tax with obedience in your hearts?

Do you understand now why we of the East oppose this law? And is it a proper return for the help which we have given to you in ridding yourselves of oppression to turn around at the first opportunity and inflict upon us a law so odious that we can not hope to make it seem endurable to our people? Is extinction of the party in the North the penalty we Democrats must pay for extending aid and sympathy to you of the South? If this "entering wedge" shall be driven in until the next national campaign resolves into a contest between the Republicans and the Populists, who will be responsible for the sectional lines upon which it will be decided? And where do you think we Democrats of the North will stand in such a struggle. Which way will our interests lie?

I have tried, Mr. President, to discuss this question without passion or prejudice. But, sir, I say plainly here and now that, when the struggle does come, as it seems bound to come if this beginning be made, I for one shall be found fighting for my own. Party ties grow weak when they make disregard of one's own convictions and disloyalty to one's own people the test of fealty. And I do not hesitate to add that even the misrule of the Republican party is to be preferred to the communism of the Populists and Socialists. If that be treason, then the self-appointed censors of Minnesota do right to lay the charge at my door. But, sir, whatever may be their judgment, God forbid that I should ever betray those whom I represent in this Chamber or fail to do that which, in my own judgment, best conserves the interests of the Democratic party and the American people.

We want to make this a country where no man shall be taxed for the private benefit of another man, but where all the blessings of free government, all the influences of church and school, all our resources, with the skill and science and invention applied to their development, shall be the common untaxed heritage of all the people, adding to the comforts of all, adding to the culture of all, adding to the happiness of all.

Those are the eloquent words of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. The sentiment is noble. The purpose is worthy of the best minds and truest hearts. But it can never be accomplished by the passage of a bill which does avowedly "tax one man for the private benefit of another man." That is why I oppose this infamous proposition to-day, and shall continue to oppose it until such time as it shall either be forced upon us by sheer weight of numbers, or we shall be freed by returning reason from the gravest danger which has confronted the Democratic party since the days of James Buchanan.

That, sir, is all I have to say upon this subject at this time. But, in justice to my party, my State, and myself, I can not leave any room for misapprehension. The Democratic party is under a distinct obligation to confer the boon of tariff reform upon the American people. We can not hope to overcome the present dissensions and fulfill this obligation unless we beat down all attempts to create discord within the ranks and strive earnestly for party harmony. With unity of action we shall succeed. Without it we must fail. And we can not perform our duty as Democrats by maligning each other or by making wanton attacks upon a Democratic Administration

Our duty is plain. The country demands, and is entitled to, prompt and decisive action. The time is ripe for quick and permanent recovery from business depression. Industry and prosperity wait upon the acts of this body. Now, if ever, we should meet the situation with candor and courage, and ask ourselves whether this bill as it stands to-day can be passed by Democratic votes. It is a time for plain speaking, and I do not hesitate to express my own conviction that this is impossible.

We can not enact a Democratic measure until we return to Democratic principles. Eliminate the socialistic income tax, reform the schedules to conform with the doctrine of a tariff for revenue, grant to our industries sufficient protection to guarantee their maintenance on the basis of American wages, and before this month shall have ended, tariff reform will cease to be the will-o'-the-wisp it is to-day, and will be enacted, by the united votes of 44 Democratic Senators, into the law of the land.

Refuse to do that, then God save the Democratic party!

PRINTING OF MILLS TARIFF BILL.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to offer at this time the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 copies of H. R. bill 9051, entitled "An act to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue;" which passed the House on July 21, 1888.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HILL. Just a word of explanation. I applied at the document room this afternoon and learned that there were no copies for distribution of the original Mills bill which passed the House of Representatives in 1888, and copies are desired for many reasons. Therefore I trust this limited number of copies may be printed.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator propose to have it printed in bill or in document form? The document form is much more convenient.

Mr. HILL. I do not care in which form it is printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was heretofore printed in document form.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator to ask the printing of 1,500 copies; 500 copies would only give us about 5 apiece. It will not cost much more to print the additional number.

Mr. HILL. I accept the suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will allow me to make a suggestion in that regard. The Mills bill was printed in two or three forms, and there were appended to it some valuable tables at the time. There are several copies in existence of the bill in that form, and, if it is to be reprinted, I suggest that those tables be added.

Mr. HILL. I do not care anything about that, if the tables are accessible.

Mr ALLISON. I do not insist upon the suggestion.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand the Senator from New York wants the bill printed as it passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. HILL. That is what I want.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then it ought to be printed in document form. It was printed in that way heretofore.

Mr. HILL. All right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion in order that I may move an executive session.

Mr. QUAY. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 3 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 18, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 17, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

RULES.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the report submitted on Thursday last by the Committee on Rules, and, by direction of that committee, I withdraw the same from the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi calls up for consideration the report previously submitted by the Committee on Rules, and by direction of that committee withdraws the same from the consideration of the House.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I would be glad if we could have such order as will enable us to hear the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred resolution 24, heretofore introduced by Mr. DE ARMOND, reports the same back with the accompanying substitute, and recommend that the substitute be adopted:

Amend Rule XV by inserting between clauses 1 and 2 the following as clause 2, and change the number of clause 2 to clause 3:

"Upon every roll call, and before the beginning thereof, the Speaker shall name two members, one from each side of the pending question, if practicable, who shall take their places at the Clerk's desk to tell the names of at least enough members who are in the Hall of the House during the roll call who do not respond, when added to those responding, to make a quorum. If a quorum does not respond on the roll call, then the names of those so noted as present shall be reported to the Speaker, who shall cause the list to be called from the Clerk's desk and recorded in the Journal; and in determining the presence of a quorum to do business those who voted, those who answered present, and those so reported present shall be considered. Members noted may, when their names are called, record their votes, notwithstanding the provisions of clause 1 of this rule."

Amend clause 1, of Rule VIII, by adding thereto the following words:

"And, on a roll call, should he not vote, he shall answer 'present.'"

So as to read:

"Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and shall vote on each question put, unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question, and on a roll call, should he not vote, he shall answer 'present.'"

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that some debate ought to be had on this, and I would like to ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to one hour and a half, the time to be controlled by the Speaker of the House, and that the previous question be considered as ordered, the vote to take place at the expiration of the time limited for debate.

Mr. WELLS. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to limiting debate on a question of this kind in this way. Let them fix a time for debate on the resolution that will enable members who have views upon the question to have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. CATCHINGS. How much time does the gentleman think should be given to debate?

Mr. WELLS. I think there should be at least a legislative day given to debate.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I can not consent to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WELLS. Then I object. And furthermore, Mr Speaker, I rise to the point of order that this is not in order at this time, because a rule already reported to the House by the Committee on Rules is the regular order of business.

Mr. SPRINGER. It has been withdrawn this morning.

Mr. WELLS. They can not withdraw it.

Mr. DOCKERY. It has already been do

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CATCHINGS. Understand, Mr. Speaker, that I am holding the floor.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to ask——

Mr. WELLS. I trust that the Committee on Rules and the honorable gentleman who has charge of this matter that is now before the House will not gag Democrats upon the floor of this House. For months the Republicans upon the floor have been given opportunity to speak relative to matters of this kind, pertaining to the counting of a quorum. The object of gentlemen on the other side has for six or seven months——

Mr. CATCHINGS and Mr. OUTHWAITE. This debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. This is a mere effort to agree upon time; debate is not in order.

Mr. WELLS. I do not wish to debate the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I am willing, Mr. Speaker, to agree to any reasonable time; but not willing to agree to an unreasonable time for debate.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman agree to two hours?

Mr. CATCHINGS. No, sir, I will not; because I want to finish this thing to-day.

Mr. BRYAN. This is a very important question, and members have views upon it they would like to go on record.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will yield one hour to those who are opposed to this rule and reserve an hour for himself he can move the previous question at the end of that period, and I think that will give ample time for debate.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that whatever is to be done, the previous question must be called now, to take effect at the time the debate ends.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that the suggestion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] for two hours' debate on each side is a very reasonable one. This is a very important question and there ought not to be any rushing of it through here with a haste that is unnecessary under the circumstances. If the experience with this rule is to be like that of a former Congress in which it existed there will be plenty of time anyhow.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary for me to add anything to what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN], but this is a very important rule and it ought to be considered with deliberation. We are proposing to adopt a rule which the Democratic party has never adopted before, and it seems to me that two hours' debate on a side is a very brief time indeed for the discussion of such a proposed departure from the established rules that have governed the House of Representatives for more than a hundred years.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to agree that the vote shall be taken at 3 o'clock, and that one hour and a half shall be given to gentlemen who desire to oppose this rule. That gives them more than half the time, and ought to be satisfactory. That gives us time enough to take action on this matter to-day, which is very much to be desired.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to appeal to the gentleman from Mississippi to allow more time. I have never expressed any views as to this rule, and I desire to occupy some time in the discussion of it.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I propose to give an hour and a half of debate to those who are opposed to the rule, and it seems to me that that ought to be satisfactory; the balance of the time to be used by those who favor the rule.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I would ask the gentleman if he is not willing to have this matter discussed to-day, to have a night session solely for the purpose of debate upon the rule, and then have the vote on the rule to-morrow at 1 o'clock. This would be perfectly satisfactory to every member of the House. A question so important as this should be carefully considered and understood. Some gentlemen who have come in the Hall since the rule was read are entirely ignorant of its language or purport. I hope the gentleman is willing that the rule should be discussed this afternoon and to-night.

Mr. CATCHINGS. No; I am not. I do not want any night session.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the gentlemen from Mississippi that gentleman who are opposed to the rule are not the only ones who desire to be heard.

Mr. CATCHINGS. My proposition gives an hour and a half to those who are opposed to it.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that he ought to agree to two hours on each side. It makes a difference of only one hour.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am disposed to assent to that, though it is very much against my judgment, and I will now state——

Mr. SPRINGER. Give the opponents of the rule two hours and have the vote at half past 3.

[Confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if order can be restored and gentlemen take their seats, we can then hear what is going on; otherwise we can not.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will please resume their seats. Business will be suspended until order is restored.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered at this time upon the report from the Committee on Rules, the vote to be taken at 4 o'clock, and the distribution of the time to be controlled by the Speaker.

Mr. SPRINGER. And equally divided.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to the floor, I ask him why not allow debate to begin on this question without insisting upon his demand? If I understand it, this matter is privileged, and the gentleman from Mississippi can take the floor at any time to call the previous question.

Why not, then, let the discussion begin, and see, as it proceeds, whether a short time or a long time ought to be occupied by it? The gentleman can call the previous question whenever he desires. If I understand the rule, it invests the Committee on Rules with power to report at any time, and the gentleman is entitled to the floor to call the previous question at any time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I can not yield to that suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand the proposition now to be that debate shall be had upon this proposition for four hours.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Until 4 o'clock.

Mr. BURROWS. And the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] demands now the previous question on the report of the committee. I am at a loss to understand the object of debate if the previous question is ordered now, because that would cut off all right of amendment.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That is precisely what I wish to do.

Mr. BURROWS. The object of debate I should suppose to be to perfect the rule if it is not perfect. But be that as it may, I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to yield to me at this time that I may offer as a substitute for the proposed rule a proposition which embodies the views of the minority of the Committee on Rules, so that if the previous question is to be ordered we can have a vote upon this substitute offered by the minority of the committee.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have no objection to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BURROWS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following——

Mr. CATCHINGS. And, Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent that the previous question be now considered as ordered on the report of the Committee on Rules and on the substitute which the gentleman from Michigan proposes to offer—that the previous question shall be considered ordered at this time, and that at 4 o'clock the House shall proceed to vote, first upon the substitute and then upon the report of the committee.

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman will allow me, I offer now, as a substitute for the report of the Committee on Rules, the proposition which I ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. BYNUM. It is not understood yet——

Mr. WELLS. Mr. Speaker, I am not able to understand whether——

Mr. BURROWS. As a substitute for the report of the Committee on Rules, I offer the following, as embodying the views of the minority.

Mr. WELLS. On what conditions?

Mr. BURROWS. No conditions.

Mr. WELLS. I understand the conditions are that the previous question——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed substitute sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clause 3, Rule XV:

On the demand of any member, or at the suggestion of the Speaker, the names of members sufficient to make a quorum in the Hall of the House who do not vote shall be noted by the Clerk and recorded in the Journal, and reported to the Speaker with the names of the members voting, and be counted and announced in determining the presence of a quorum to do business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] has the floor.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Now, Mr. Speaker, if you will put my request I shall be obliged.

Mr. WELLS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I have a proposition which I trust the gentleman from Mississippi will allow to be read at present for information and allow to come in for a vote afterwards as a substitute.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I can not consent to a vote upon it. It may be read.

Mr. GROW. I ask that it be read now for information——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It can be read later.

Mr. GROW. But it can not be voted on unless it be proposed before the previous question is ordered.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. We do not desire it to be before the House.

Mr. GROW. I will offer it, if I may have the opportunity, as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. OUTHWAITE. One amendment has already been permitted from that side of the House.

Mr. WELLS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I am in some uncertainty as to the parliamentary status of the question sought to be presented by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has made a request for unanimous consent, which the Chair was going to submit.

Mr. WELLS. On what proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it if the gentleman will permit. The gentleman from Mississippi ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered ordered upon the report of the committee and upon the proposition of the minority of the committee, and that the vote be now ordered to be taken on those propositions at 4 o'clock.

Mr. WELLS. I object unless——

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think, Mr. Speaker, I have made all reasonable effort to come to a fair agreement. I now move the previous question on the substitute of the minority of the committee and on the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BURROWS. I should like to inquire, as a parliamentary matter, whether the Speaker would hold, in view of what has been said, that there has been such debate on this question as to cut off all further debate if the previous question should now be ordered, or whether, after ordering the previous question, fifteen minutes' debate on each side will be allowed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that what has taken place has been an effort at an agreement rather than debate within the meaning of the rule.

Mr. BURROWS. Then, if the previous question should now be ordered, there will be fifteen minutes' debate on each side?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. This has been an effort at agreement rather than debate in the proper sense.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were on a division (called for by Mr. BRYAN)—ayes 122, noes 98.

Mr. WELLS and Mr. BRYAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question upon the report of the Committee on Rules and the substitute of the minority of the committee.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 120, not voting 93; as follows:

Mr. SPERRY with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. SNODGRASS with Mr. MOON.

Mr. DAVEY with Mr. REYBURN.

Mr. COOMBS with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. MONEY with Mr. LOUDENSLAGER.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] is recognized to control the time in support of the report of the Committee on Rules, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield to the gentleman to make a request.

Mr. HATCH. I want to ask unanimous consent of the House that the debate on this proposition may continue until 4 o'clock.

Mr. BYNUM. Regular order.

Mr. HATCH. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit me to make my statement, perhaps he would not demand the regular order.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the regular order be proceeded with.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to record my vote in the negative on the vote just taken. I was under the impression that my pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] was still in force. I am informed, however, that he was present and voted under the impression that I had been informed of his presence as he had directed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the request under the rule.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The gentleman with whom I am paired, I am informed, has voted on this question. I did not know he was here, and therefore refrained from voting when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that he can not entertain the request at this time. After the result of the vote is announced it would not be in order except by unanimous consent to withdraw a vote. The gentleman will perceive that such a change might affect the result.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I should have voted in the negative on this question had I not believed my pair was still in force.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to yield to me for a single moment for a suggestion.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS. As the rule proposed by the committee provides a manner of counting a quorum, and the substitute offered by myself was also designed for the purpose of counting a quorum, and the only difference between them is as to the method, rather than delay the consideration of this matter and thereby multiply a number of roll calls, I will withdraw the substitute offered by myself so that the motion may come directly on the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The substitute is then withdrawn.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In this discussion, as I understand it, gentlemen on the other side of the Hall are in favor of the principle of counting a quorum, and the Committee on Rules has provided a manner. Now, in the division of time will there be no provision made for those who do not favor the counting of a quorum under any circumstances, and who differ therefore from the majority of the Committee on Rules and from the minority represented by the other side?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that question. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], having reported the proposition, is entitled to fifteen minutes, and while giving fifteen minutes to the minority of the committee, the Chair of course will be glad to recognize gentlemen in opposition to the proposition, which is the intent of the rule. Of course if it be true that the whole committee agree, why then perhaps it would be only right and proper that some gentlemen who do not agree to the report of the committee should be allowed to be heard.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I think it quite just that, if no more than fifteen minutes are to be allowed on a side, there should be some unusual apportionment of time. On this side of the House we regard the rule presented by the committee as containing the principle for which we have contended, although we have some doubt about the details of it, and think that they may perhaps not prove entirely satisfactory to the House; but we have not made any opposition to the rule, nor have we any great desire to do so, except so far as we might like to have it modified if it might be done under favorable and proper circumstances.

Therefore we have felt that it might be proper that there should be a division of time in such fashion that those who are opposed to the principle of the rule might have an opportunity to express their opinion. For this reason I had hoped that there might be no objection to such an extended debate as might seem to be reasonable; and I want it distinctly understood that this side does not object to such an extension of debate as will enable all parties to express their opinions. Fifteen minutes on a side are hardly enough, and I sincerely hope that the House will indulge gentlemen upon the other side by allowing them a sufficient extension of time, with such a division as may seem just to the House and to the Speaker, so that all views may be represented, which is the object of all debate.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that an hour on each side may be given to the discussion of this matter, which is important to all parties and to both sides of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] just submitted a similar request, but the Chair will submit it again. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] asks unanimous consent that there be one hour's debate on a side on this proposition. Is there objection?

Mr. BYNUM. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. REED. The time is so grossly inadequate that if I have fifteen minutes I will endeavor to distribute it with reference to allowing the opposition to be heard, in concert with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS].

The SPEAKER. The Chair was going to suggest that he hoped the committee would yield a part of their time on each side to gentlemen in opposition to the measure, so that they might have an opportunity to be heard. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Mississippi——

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my remarks, I wish to say that I have been requested to ask unanimous consent that any gentlemen who desire to do so may file their remarks and have them printed in the RECORD. I make that request.

Mr. REED. I shall have to object to that.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, that would be a rather melancholy sort of literature.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a moment, because it is my wish to yield the bulk of the time which is allotted to this side to gentlemen who are opposed to the rule.

I wish to say to the House that in pursuance of the wish expressed by the Democratic caucus which was held on Friday last the Committee on Rules have had under consideration the matter of providing a rule by which gentlemen who are present and do not vote may be taken into consideration in determining whether or not a quorum is present.

A great variety of suggestions were submitted to the committee, perhaps a dozen, possibly more. The committee have considered all the various methods for ascertaining a quorum which were submitted to them, and the majority of the committee believe that the rule which has been reported will enable the House, easily, and with expedition and with entire fairness, to ascertain whether a quorum be present or not, whenever the roll be called.

The committee have recommended an amendment to Rule VIII, which is the rule requiring that all members shall vote when their names are called. The amendment is that they shall vote, or answer "present." It is hoped and believed, Mr. Speaker, that by that means alone the presence of a quorum will many times and possibly at all times be developed, and certainly there can be no safer and no fairer method of ascertaining the presence of a gentleman than by his own response.

But the rule, looking to a contingency where gentlemen might not respond when their names are called, provides that upon each roll call the Speaker shall appoint two tellers, who shall take their places by the Clerk's desk, and that it shall be the duty of those tellers to note the presence of gentlemen who are in the Hall of the House during the roll call, who do not vote, or who do not answer present: and that the names reported by them shall be again read after the roll call has been finished, and on this last call gentlemen who have been so noted may, if they wish to do so, cast their votes.

And in determining the question whether a quorum is present or not the Speaker is required to take into consideration the names of gentlemen who have voted yea and nay, the names of gentlemen who have responded that they were present, and if necessary, the name of others who have been noted by these tellers, and who have not responded at all. This is the plan. It is simple, and must in the nature of things be fair, because this telling is to be done by two tellers, one to represent each side of the question. So that such report as they make must be fair; it must be correct, because it is a report which will be agreed to by both sides of the question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will yield to any gentleman who desires to oppose this rule.

I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I am always ready and willing to do what my party decides, but I regard this as a question which ought to have more deliberation than is given in this debate. The Constitution particularly states that upon the demand of one-fifth the yeas and nays shall be recorded. On the vote upon a bill which is vetoed the Constitution especially states again that the noes shall be recorded, and that the yeas shall be recorded; and I ask this House to consider if the rule complies with and provides for all the exigencies that might arise on a vote of that character; and I think, Mr. Speaker, we ought at first give a full opportunity to test the effect of enforcing the law we now have——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I hope the gentleman from Maine will now take his fifteen minutes.

Mr. REED. If any gentleman on the other side desires time I will yield to him. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the gentleman from Maine for this courtesy. The question upon which we are called to act is one of a great deal more importance than some members seem to think, and the objection which is made to the rule by some of us, who have not been able to favor it, is based upon reasons far more weighty than gentlemen have assumed.

The constitution of the State of Nebraska, which I have the honor in part to represent, contains this provision:

> No bill shall be passed unless by assent of a majority of all the members elected to each house of the Legislature, and the question upon the final passage shall be taken immediately upon its last reading, and the yeas and nays shall be entered upon the journal.

The constitutions of a majority of the States of the Union, among them the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and I might name them all if time permitted, provide the same, the object being to prevent less than one-half of all the members elected to the Legislature from passing laws. It is only by the concurrence of a majority of the members that we can know that the majority of the people desire the law. The Constitution of the United States does not contain a similar provision; and there is no question, since the decision of the Supreme Court, that it is within the power of this House to declare by rule in what manner a quorum may be ascertained. It can be done in the manner provided in this rule, or it can be done by the call of the yeas and nays, as it has been done for a hundred years. Now, the question with me is this: which is the safer plan? According to the rule which has been in vogue a hundred years, the minority has the safeguard which is expressly secured in the constitutions of a majority of the States; according to the old rule the minority, by refusing to vote, can compel the concurrence of a majority before a law is passed.

Now, I believe that is a wise provision. I do not see why it is wiser in a State than in Congress; I do not know why it is necessary that the members of the Legislature in my State, or in New York, should be compelled to vote yea or nay when a bill shall pass, and that a majority shall concur, unless the same reasons apply in this body.

We are asked to change this rule, which has been in operation since the beginning of the Government, and adopt a new rule; a rule not intended to enable the majority to rule, but to enable less than one-half of the members of Congress to pass laws for this country. I believe that the innovation is a dangerous one. There is far more safety in giving to the minority the power to delay legislation until a majority have expressed themselves in favor of a law. How can you tell that the people of the United States desire a particular law except by the voice of their representatives; and how can we tell that their representatives believe the bill should become a law until they have expressed themselves by vote in favor of the proposition? The naked question brought before us by this rule is, "Shall we so make our rules that the minority of the people of the United States may make the laws, or shall we retain the rule which enables us to compel the concurrence of a majority when it seems of sufficient importance?"

Of course the right to remain silent can be used to filibuster, but we have a rule which shuts off filibustering when a majority desires to vote. We have it in the power of the House—and I think it is a wise provision—to put an end to dilatory motions and to bring the House to a vote when the majority so desires, but a rule to count a quorum is not designed to facilitate the government of a majority but to enable the representatives of a minority of the people to do business and make laws in the absence of the representatives of a part of the people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may continue my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I think that ought not to be granted, unless the same privilege is extended to everybody.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of amending the Constitution of the United States, or of adopting the provisions of the constitutions of several of the States that have recently been adopted on the subject of requiring a quorum to pass laws. This is a question as to whether this House of Representatives of the people of the United States shall have such rules for its government as will enable it to do the business that our constituents have sent us here to do. [Applause on the Republican side.] We have tried the old system. We have been here a month without doing two days' actual business, and our constituents are tired of this delay, and I hope this House is tired of it. [Applause on the Republican side.] If we shall adopt this rule, we will from this time forward have it in our power to discharge the duties which our constituents have confided to us. I will hail the adoption of this rule as the dawn of a new and better era in American legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. REED. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE].

When Mr. KILGORE rose he was greeted with applause in the House and in the galleries.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The Chair will admonish occupants of the galleries that they are there simply by courtesy of the House, and that the rules require that they shall make no demonstrations either of applause or disapproval. The Chair observed that in this instance the applause began in the galleries. That is a violation of the courtesy of the House, which must not be repeated.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the time consumed by the applause which greeted my appearance on the floor will not be taken out of my time. [Laughter.]

I am indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] for an opportunity to express my unalterable opposition to the principle of a rule of which he is the parent. [Laughter.] I will not say the honored progenitor, because the parent may be dishonored in his progeny. He is honored by his own party, and honored for his distinguished ability as a party leader, but he and I are so wide apart that, while I can honor the man, I can not honor his views upon this question, nor, indeed, upon any other great public question. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I insist that the proposed rule is unnecessary. It is inexpedient. Its adoption will not expedite the legitimate business of this House. Rules are not made in parliamentary assemblies for the purpose of making the transaction of business easy and expeditious. All written rules for the government of parliamentary bodies are devised to restrain and hinder the hasty and inconsiderate transaction of business. The country complains that there is a heap too much bad legislation. Important and salutary legislation can be enacted without any rules or under such rules as have prevailed in this body for a century. Pernicious and partisan legislation and legislation in the interest of jobs and schemes to plunder the people and increase their burdens must be pushed by just such drastic and despotic methods as the proposed rule authorizes. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen may laugh, but that is the simple truth. Rules are made in parliamentary bodies to bridle the majority, to enforce deliberation, as is suggested by a colleague near me, and to compel the majority to take all the responsibility which properly attaches to action of Congress on all measures. Now, I repeat that this proposed rule is unnecessary. With a majority of 94 upon the Democratic side of the House as against the Republicans, and 82 over all opposition, with 38 members more than a quorum upon this side of the House, it is within the power of the Democracy, if its members are faithful in the discharge of their duties, to go on with the public business without adopting any such stringent rule as this, and without violating the principles of free government in its effort to avoid the paramount legislative evil of the day—absenteeism. This rule, if adopted, can do no good, and may be productive of infinite harm.

If it subserves the purpose of its authors and advocates it will eliminate the minority from all participation in the business of the House. The object of the partisans of this rule is to impose such restraints on the minority as will make it powerless in the transaction of business unless that minority is fortunate enough to have the Speaker and the two tellers to be named by him under this rule acting with it in concert. If 90 members vote for a proposition then the Speaker and the tellers can do the rest by counting 89 other members as they flit to and fro about this Chamber. And so the enforcement of this rule will really put the legislation of this body in the hands of a minority. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REED. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I recognize the right of a majority to make rules to nullify the failure of a minority to comply with any rule of the House. Disorderly conduct the House has a right to punish, but nonaction is not disorderly conduct, and therefore the House has no right to punish a man for not voting. One objection to the rule reported by the committee is that it seems to be more cumbersome than is necessary. I think it might be simplified so as to save time in calling the roll, and also to save members from being turned into clerks to assist in doing the business of the House. I will ask for the reading of what I send to the Clerk's desk, which would obviate these two objections.

The Clerk read, as a part of Mr. GROW'S remarks, the following proposed rule:

On every roll call for a yea-and-nay vote or on a call of the House the names of members not answering shall be entered on the Journal. At the beginning of any such roll call the Speaker shall designate one of the clerks at the desk who shall keep a correct list of the names of members present and not answering when their names are called.

After the roll shall have been called through, without a recall of those not answering, the Speaker shall cause the list kept by the designated clerk to be called, and the names of those not answering shall be entered on the Journal as present, and such names shall be counted as part of the members necessary for a quorum. Any member whose name shall be on the list of the designated clerk, stating to the Speaker that he was within the bar of the House when his name was called, can have his name changed from that list to the list of yeas and nays, as he may desire; provided it is done before the vote is finally announced.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] has expired.

Mr. REED. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, is there any man in this country who believes that if the Fifty-first Congress had not been so hard pushed for a majority, this rule for counting a quorum would have been adopted? No. Then, sir, with a Democratic majority on this side of 70 or 80, with 39 more votes than a quorum, at this stage of the proceedings of this Congress we come here and present this humiliating spectacle to the American people [applause on the Republican side], confessing that we can not transact the public business without invoking the exceptional and revolutionary methods of the Fifty-first Congress to aid us in the work, that we can not transact the public business under the rules which have prevailed in this House ever since the foundation of this Government with the exception of the Fifty-first Congress. I tell you, sir, that many a time it is a man's highest duty to his constituents to remain silent and not vote at all. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman from Maine give me a minute?

Mr. REED. I have but three minutes left. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes to distribute among gentlemen on the other side. [Laughter.] [A pause.]

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to address the House again upon the general subject. This scene here to-day is a more effective address than any I could make. The House is about to adopt the principle for which we contended in the Fifty-first Congress and is about to adopt it under circumstances which show conclusively to the country its value. No words that I can utter can add to the importance of the occasion. I congratulate the Fifty-third Congress upon the wise decision that it is about to make. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE].

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who oppose this measure seem to think that the object which the framers of the Constitution had in their minds in providing for the taking of the yeas and nays was to ascertain the presence of a quorum. In point of fact, such a purpose never crossed the mind of any one who was present as a member of that convention. If gentlemen will turn to the debates which took place at that time they will see that the purpose of ascertaining a quorum was not considered. The object was simply to give an opportunity——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia rose.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I can not yield to the gentleman in the little time I have.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. But the gentleman is misrepresenting the position we take.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The object in providing for taking the yeas and nays was simply to give those members who desire to have their judgment recorded an opportunity for the making of such a record.

Now, as to the necessity of this measure. Gentleman here say that with a Democratic majority in this House of such numbers we ought to be able to proceed with our business without this rule.

Sir, continually during this session this House has witnessed that, with our majority of Democrats, a quorum upon one roll call has frequently melted away before following immediately upon the same legislation. There have been times when we have had under consideration here measures of the greatest political significance and public importance, of the greatest importance to parties and Representatives here; and on such occasions there would be upon one roll call the manifestation of a quorum, while upon the next a part of those who had voted would absent themselves or refrain from voting. Thus quorums were coming and going. For days there was no opportunity to have business transacted. Frequently members who would be here upon one roll call would immediately afterward pass out of the House, and from carelessness or indifference, or some other unexplained reason, remain out until after the next roll call, thus compelling us to enter upon a call of the House and to have several roll calls in connection therewith, and those faithful in the performance of their duties were often thus punished by those unfaithful. There are always a certain number of our members who, on account of sickness or for other good reasons, must be granted leave of absence. This has often reduced our margin above a quorum. The majority here must proceed with the public business—not permitting the minority to control the business of the House and dictate legislation. This rule gives only a fair opportunity to the majority—those who are present and willing to stay here day after day and hour after hour to do their duty, anxious that the public business shall be transacted—an opportunity to transact the public business and not allowing them to be unnecessarily stayed in the performance of their public duty. It is one of the strongest reasons in favor of the passage of such a rule as this that neither indifference nor necessary absence of members, nor the disposition on the part of perhaps a dozen or two of members to obstruct business, shall prevent the other 170, it may be, from proceeding with the business of the House.

What is the real requirement of the Constitution with reference to the presence of a quorum? Every day legislation is adopted here which goes through by assent, one or two individuals only voting thereon. It takes place by consent; the objection of one man would be sufficient to prevent it. Every day we take votes simply by a count of the members, and those votes are announced without appealing to the roll call, and legislation passed in that way is oftentimes just as important as other legislation, and it is certainly as valid in every respect as that passed on a call of the yeas and nays. All this is acknowledged and accepted as a proper and fit method of legislation under the Constitution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has one minute remaining. Does he desire to occupy it?

Mr. REED. I yield that minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CATCHINGS. And I also yield to the gentleman from New York one minute, so that he will have two minutes.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, there was one scene in the Fifty-first Congress which should never be forgotten. One Democrat on this floor, Col. O'Ferrall of Virginia—and he was the only Democrat on the floor—was counted to make a quorum to ruthlessly unseat a Virginia Democrat. And if E. C. Venable had been on this floor instead of Col. O'Ferrall, E. C. Venable would have been counted to unseat E. C. Venable. We ought to learn something from experience.

The fault I have to find with this rule is that there is no limit here. In the Fifty-first Congress it was possible for the Speaker of the House, standing at his desk, mallet in hand, to cast his vote alone and to count every man on the floor not voting to make up a quorum. So that it was possible, if not probable, that by the vote of the Speaker himself, and by that vote alone, it was possible to declare a law passed by the House of Representatives. Now, I see no limit here. It appears to me that if we are to obey the Constitution we ought to obey it in its plain letter or else fix a limit which will not allow one man or any five, or ten, or fifteen, or fifty men to vote, and count all the others in the House as present and not voting, in order to secure the passage of a law. I am opposed to the measure. It is better to be safe than to be sorry.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, in closing this debate I wish to say that the idea which seems to have been spread broadcast over the country that a rule such as this is indispensable and that the House can not transact business without it, is utterly without foundation. There are other methods by which the presence of a quorum might have been had on this floor.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact—that if in the judgment of any gentleman present this is a revolutionary proceeding in the sense that it is a departure from methods which have heretofore prevailed in this House and always hitherto on this side, its object is to meet a revolutionary situation—a new departure, which has been entered upon by gentlemen on the other side.

It is the first time in the history of the American Congress that we have seen one of the old and great parties of the country, training under the banner of its leader, sitting silent in their seats on this floor and refusing to vote on trivial and non-partisan questions. It is a fact that we have been compelled, owing to this idea of statesmanship, to resort to some measure to control the action of a great and united minority, which, upon every question, even on the approval of the Journal of the House, or the discharge of a writ ordering members in custody, or when any other nonpartisan question arises, absolutely refuses to record its vote. Under these circumstances we are compelled to resort to some heroic measure to enable a majority to transact that business which the people of this country have sent them here to transact.

During the Fifty-first Congress there were times when gentlemen on this side of the House sat in their seats and refrained from voting, or absented themselves so as to avoid being counted; but the country knows, the Democratic party in this House knows, that we were then struggling against the enaction of partisan legislation proposed which we regarded as vicious, even fatal. But here in the Fifty-third Congress, when no such questions are presented, we are met by a minority of the House sitting silent in their seats and refusing to participate in the most ordinary matters of legislation which the House is called upon to consider and dispose of.

Mr. BYNUM. I rise to a question of order. The time of this debate has already extended beyond the half hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has one minute of his time remaining.

Mr. BYNUM. According to the clock 33 minutes have already been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is the keeper of the time under the rules of the House.

The gentleman from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. CATCHINGS. It is only necessary to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Rules, feeling that some step ought to be taken in order that the majority, notwithstanding the action of a recalcitrant minority, should be enabled to transact business, have considered the matter carefully, and after a great deal of reflection upon the subject have reported a rule which, if adopted, they believe will be effective to accomplish the results desired.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the rule reported from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BRYAN and others. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 213, nays 47, not voting 93; as follows:

So the resolution was adopted.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. LISLE with Mr. MARSH.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER with Mr. CANNON of Illinois.

Mr. DALZELL. I am paired with the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. WILSON. If he were present, I should vote "aye."

At the request of Mr. WEVER the vote was recapitulated.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I am recorded as not voting. I was here during the roll call, but was called out of the room for a moment.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall during the roll call?

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the Chair mean during the whole call?

The SPEAKER. It implies being present when the gentleman's name was called.

Mr. COCKRAN. Not having heard my name called, I could not tell.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the request under the rule.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

[Applause.]

On motion of Mr. CATCHINGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE JOURNAL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

The Journal was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal as read will be approved.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, my impression is that before the approval of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, just read, the first question in order—and I only raise it now for the purpose of having it passed upon and the practice settled—is the approval of the Journal of last Thursday's proceedings, which was read on Friday morning, and on which a motion was made for the previous question, the yeas and nays ordered upon that demand, and then the House adjourned. The Chair then intimated that the approval of the Journal of the day immediately preceding the one on which it is read was first in order and should be first approved, regardless of the fact that previous Journals had not been approved.

The SPEAKER. That is the way the rule reads.

Mr. BURROWS. This question I find upon examination was raised when Mr. Randall was Speaker of the House, and was decided by him to the effect that where the House had failed to approve its Journal for several days, and had adjourned from day to day, immediately after the reading of the Journal of the preceding day the first question in order was on the approval of the Journal first in date; and then, to make the ruling more binding, the Speaker submitted it to the House, and the House decided that the first question was the approval of the first Journal.

It is of course of no importance except that the practice may be established. But I call the attention of the Chair to the proceedings of March 23, 1880. When the House met on that day, and after reading the Journal of the preceding day, Mr. Conger made the point of order that the first question before the House was the approval of the Journal of a previous day. There was some discussion in regard to it, in which several gentlemen participated, among them the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who made the same point as that suggested by the Chair, that under the rules the House must first proceed to the approval of the Journal immediately before the House. I will call attention to what Mr. BLACKBURN said. On March 24, the next day, the House met at 12 o'clock, and immediately after prayer, before the reading of the Journal, Mr. Randall, the Speaker of the House, said:

The question before the House is the question of privilege raised by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLane] as to Monday's Journal.

This was Wednesday. Mr. McLane had claimed that the approval of the Journal was a privileged question, and that being so, the House must consider the Journal earliest in date remaining unapproved.

Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois. Is it not in order first to read the Journal of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Journal of yesterday relates exclusively to the matter of the correctness of the Journal of Monday. The question which the Chair submitted to the House on yesterday was the question whether the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland contained a question of privilege.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the Clerk to read the first clause of the first rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. The Speaker shall take the chair on every legislative day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned at the last sitting, immediately call the members to order, and on the appearance of a quorum cause the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting to be read, having previously examined and approved the same.

Our present rule, to which the Speaker has alluded, is of course the same. Mr. BLACKBURN said;

Now the point of order that I make is that this is a new legislative day, as distinct from yesterday. The House did not take a recess on yesterday, but adjourned. This is a new legislative day; and under the first clause of the first rule defining the duties of the Speaker it is declared that he—

"Shall take the chair on every legislative day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned at the last sitting"—

Then, repeating the rule and commenting upon the various clauses, he continued:

I take it for granted that the Speaker has complied with the last portion of that clause, and that he has examined and approved the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday. And the point I make is that that clause of the rule will not be observed or obeyed unless the Speaker now causes the Clerk to read a Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Then, after a protracted debate on the question, to which I need not allude at length, in which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], Mr. Garfield, and others participated, Speaker Randall said:

The approval of the Journal on other days, as well as on Mondays, is not provided for by mere implication, but by the direct terms of the rule.

Mr. CONGER. The two clauses taken together provide for the approval of the Journal on every day of the week.

The SPEAKER. That is the view of the Chair. He therefore thinks it is not only in accordance with the practice, but is obligatory upon the House each legislative day to take action on its Journal. In submitting this morning the questions of privilege, first as to Monday's Journal, which came before the House for its determination on the point whether it involved a question of privilege or not, the Chair based his action upon Rule IX, which states that "questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings," and provides in the last clause that such questions "shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess."

Here is a question submitted to the House for its determination as a question of privilege, relating to the Journal of Monday—a Journal prior to that which would be read under the construction which the gentleman from Kentucky puts upon Rule I. But it matters not whether the Journal of yesterday's proceedings be read now or not, for the reason that if read the question of privilege as to a prior day's Journal would immediately come up, and the House must dispose of the Journal of its proceedings in the order of date. The Chair therefore thinks that it is really not a matter of consequence whether the Journal of yesterday's proceedings be read now or not. If read, the question will immediately come up on the prior day's Journal.—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, second session Forty-sixth Congress, page 1837.

That was the ruling of Speaker Randall, and finally the ruling was submitted to the House and sustained by the House. It is not necessary for me to allude to that. Since that time, and I think I may say before that time, it has been the universal practice, where the Journal of a day's proceedings has gone over without approval—as it sometimes does by unanimous consent—when the question of the approval of the Journal comes up, action must take place in the order of the dates of the Journal; and as a matter of practice I think it ought to be so held now, and I have failed to find a single instance where the Journals have been approved in reverse order.

As the Chair understands, I only make the point for the purpose of having the practice settled. I think the first question after the reading of this Journal is the approval of the Journal of last Thursday's proceedings, to which I suppose there will be no objection. It is simply a question as to the order of the approval and the correct practice of the House.

The SPEAKER. The decision referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] seems to cover the case. As the Chair understands, the question was referred to and decided by the House. The Chair does not see the reason of it, but will bow to it. The Chair confesses his inability to see any reason why the rule of practice should have been adopted by the House which was adopted in that case. The rules provide that the Speaker shall take the chair at 12 o'clock, and, on the appearance of a quorum, cause the Journal of the preceding day's session to be read, and approved if correct. Suppose for some reason the day passes without this having been done. The next day arrives. The Chair directs the Journal of the preceding day to be read, which Journal itself discloses that a Journal has not been approved. That Journal itself discloses that the first question to come up after its approval is the approval of that Journal which has not been approved, because that was the proposition pending before the House. So that the Chair is unable to see any reason for the rule that, under existing conditions, the first question is the approval of the Journal most remote instead of that most near to the time of this meeting.

It is true, the question seems heretofore to have been submitted to the House, and the practice contended for seems to have been approved by the House. The Chair will conform to that decision. The question is upon the approval of Thursday's Journal; and on that question the previous question has been demanded and the yeas and nays have been ordered thereon.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the Journal be considered as approved.

Mr. SPRINGER. Without the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. PICKLER. I object. Let us see how the new rule works. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota objects.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the objection. Without further objection, then, that order suggested will be made, and the Journal will be approved.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. Now, the question recurs upon Friday's Journal.

Mr. DOCKERY. I make the same request as to that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the approval of Friday's Journal, and the yeas and nays have been ordered. The gentleman from Missouri makes the same request as to Friday's Journal. Without objection, that will be ordered, and the Journal will be approved.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now before the House is the approval of the Journal of Saturday. If there be no objection, that Journal will be approved.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. Now, the question before the House is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to discharge the warrant of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. REED. I desire to rise to a question of privilege, concerning the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think it has the right of way of the pending question?

Mr. REED. I desire to submit it to the Chair, and state my object, and possibly some arrangement can be entered into. Now, the proposition is to discontinue that order. It seems to me, from what examination I have been able to make, that it is liable to establish a precedent which, perhaps, it would not be wise that the House should establish; and I think the whole proceedings have taken place without that full knowledge of the precedents which an examination since has given. I should like to have the matter disposed of in some way without establishing a precedent.

I do not care what is done with the resolution, whether it be referred to the Committee on Rules, or to the Committee on the Judiciary, or to any committee of the House, so that the matter may be examined and impartially disposed of, if it is possible. The fact that the House took this action ought not to preclude us from an examination of it, when we consider what its possible effect might be. The objection which I have to a continuing order is precisely the situation which it finds us in, and which I think was not anticipated. There are, I find, twenty-eight gentlemen of the House who are liable to arrest by the Sergeant-at-Arms. It is true that this is a proposition to discharge that order, and I have no objection, so far as I am concerned to that, except that it would be likely to furnish a precedent. Of course, no harm follows from it to-day; but the House can easily conceive how some wrong might occur with the Sergeant-at-Arms having the power which such a continuing order would give.

I think the decision of Mr. Carlisle, as quoted in the Digest, and quoted incorectly, has been at the foundation of it; and I think when it is examined it will be seen the result is not what the House would desire to contemplate. I care not about the method, I am not bigoted about the manner in which it shall be done, but perhaps the best way of reaching the result is to rise to a question of privilege, following the precedent which occurred in the case the gentleman from Michigan has cited for another purpose, when Mr. McLane, of Maryland, interposed with a quesion of privilege, where a motion had been made in regard to a reference under rules which did not permit any reconsideration of a motion to refer. My suggestion is:

Whereas, the continuing order sought to be dispensed with is contrary to the Constitution and rules of the House, the same is hereby declared void.

Now, I have no objection to that being referred to the Committee on Rules, or, as it involves a constitutional question, to the Committee on the Judiciary. I simply make the suggestion——

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let it go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED. I have no ob ection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let this vote be decided in the affirmative, and then it can be referred.

Mr. REED. I do not know about that. The matter will do no harm at present. It can be referred to the Committee on Rules. The whole matter can be referred to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion to discharge the order.

Mr. REED. Let me explain from my point of view.

It does not matter what stage the proceeding is in when a question of privilege which concerns the House intervenes, because the very nature of a question of privilege is this: The House, going on with its regular course of business, finds something which concerns its very existence and its methods of doing business, and it therefore lays aside the business temporarily and proceeds to dispose of the question of privilege; just as a workman lays aside his work and attends to a case of his own sickness. That is an analogy which fairly expresses the idea. Now that is precisely what I want done in this case, that this matter shall go to the Committee on Rules or to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the question be determined.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not see that in order to get that question determined for the future guidance of the House it is necessary to suspend the proceedings in regard to a rule which has already been made by the House. I think we had better vote on that question and then let this come up separately.

Mr. REED. I want to submit this. I do not see any other method of getting at the question.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman read his proposition again. I did not hear it distinctly.

Mr. REED again read his resolution as above.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let that be referred to the committee if you choose.

Mr. REED. But the whole matter has to be referred if this is referred.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think I must insist upon action upon the pending motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. REED. I have no objection, after this matter is disposed of, to the adoption of a resolution stating that the Sergeant-at-Arms is released from the order for the arrest of members.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think we had better vote on the pending question.

Mr. REED. All I can do, Mr. Speaker, is to submit the matter. I do it as a member of the House, actuated, as I believe, by an honest desire that our proceedings here shall be conducted in a regular and orderly manner.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Well, your resolution can be referred and reported back.

Mr. REED. This can be referred, but the whole matter must be referred at the same time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. Speaker, this I claim is the regular order. And I want to say just a word on the propriety of this proposition. If the Speaker will examine the case which was presented——

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman proceeds, admitting for the sake of the argument that the order was erroneously made, how does this get in now, when the question is of discharging that order?

Mr. REED. This gets in as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. What constitutes it a question of privilege?

Mr. REED. I will try to state that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will recollect that the House is dividing on a proposition.

Mr. REED. Yes, I recollect that, and I recognize the fact that the House is dividing on a proposition as the strongest possible reason for a continuance of action, and, as against anything but a question of privilege which concerns the whole House, any interruption of that proceeding would be entirely inadmissible. I not only recognize that, but I have repeatedly contended for it. But my proposition is that this case is an exceptional one, because it makes the whole question a question of privilege, and it is not only a general question of the privilege of the House—such, for instance, as an attempt to destroy the House or something of that sort, of which the House might have just obtained knowledge and which would necessarily take precedence—but it is a question of privilege relating to this very pending transaction, and is therefore admissible on that ground. Rule IX provides that—

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; * * * and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

It will be seen that questions of privilege are, from their very nature, of the very highest order, and any question of privilege which relates to the House itself is of the highest possible order of privilege. It is entitled to precedence under general parliamentary law, and it is entitled to special precedence under our rules. Now, in this case, the matter being a question of privilege, the House of course is entitled to dispose of it in whatever way it pleases. The fact that it comes up and is a question of privilege does not prevent the House from referring it, from laying it on the table, or from doing anything with it that it chooses; nor does it prevent the Speaker, if he sees fit, from submitting the question to the House whether it is a question of privilege. All these courses are open to the Speaker and to the House, and my suggestion to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] and to the Committee on Rules is simply that this matter shall be referred to a committee to be considered carefully so that we may establish a proper precedent instead of an improper one.

And I beg to say that the proceeding is, with all due respect to the prior action of the House, simply for the purpose of establishing a good precedent and preventing the establishment of a bad one. It is my deliberate judgment that there is not single member of those 28 who can be held for an instant under arrest. I think any one of those members would have the right to expel the Sergeant-at-Arms from his immediate presence, as the rule stands now. But at the same time such a rule as this might be used at some future time in a way that nobody contemplated when the original proceeding was adopted.

A similar question to this was raised as a question of privilege on the approval of the Journal, and involved precisely the same principle. But the rule itself is so decidedly simple and plain that it is very difficult to add much if anything to it.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I do not see how the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine could possibly be carried into execution. The parliamentary situation is this: A report was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms of his proceedings in pursuance of a warrant of arrest which had been issued and put in his hands for execution. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be discharged from the further execution of that warrant, and upon that motion the yeas and nays were ordered. Now I submit with all due respect that it is a most extraordinary proposition from a parliamentary standpoint, as it seems to me, that we should undertake to refer to the Committee on Rules or the Committee on the Judiciary, or any other committee, a motion pending before the House on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. How could such a thing be done even if the House desired to do it? You can not refer to any committee a question upon which the House is actually dividing.

The best way for the House, Mr. Speaker, to pass upon this question of privilege (if it be one) is to vote on it; and if the House takes the same view of it that my friend from Maine does, it will vote down the motion to discharge: on the other hand, if it does not regard it as a question of privilege, or if it regards this as a proper proceeding in pursuance of the Constitution and rules of the House, it will vote to discharge the writ. I do not see how we can adopt any better method of disposing of this question than by letting the House settle it; and the regular order would bring about that result.

Mr. REED. I think I have failed to make myself understood on one point by the gentleman from Mississippi. The question of privilege being raised on this phase of the proposition, the whole proposition would, as a matter of course, go to the committee to which it might be referred; and it would thus be removed for the time being from the House, until the committee should report for the action of the House. So that my suggestion involves no interference with the business of the House. In fact this is a part and parcel of the business of the House.

It is perfectly true, as the gentleman from Mississippi says, that a motion to discharge, if adopted, would vacate this particular order; but it would not cover the matter in which the House is interested as a question of privilege. That is the point.

Mr. CATCHINGS. But if the House should agree with the gentleman from Maine and vote down the motion to discharge, then it would be in order to offer an amendment.

Mr. REED. But if the House agrees with me——

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that neither voting up nor voting down the motion would cover the object of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. Voting the resolution up or down would cover it; but not the other.

Mr. CATCHINGS. If the House should vote down the motion to discharge, the whole question of the procedure of the Sergeant-at-Arms would be before the House for such disposition as it might choose to make.

Mr. REED. But that does not get rid of the question of privilege.

Mr. CATCHINGS. It would then be in order to offer a resolution that the writ be declared void.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House I have seen the custom under which we operated in this case arise. For years whenever we were trying to get a quorum, we would sit here all night while absent members were being arrested, or rather effort being made to arrest them, and the only people who would in fact suffer any punishment would be, not the members who were derelict by reason of their absence, but those who were sitting here trying to obtain a quorum. In order to put an end to that practice and adopt a proceeding by which the sufferers would be the members who had, without excuse, absented themselves, the custom followed in this instance was adopted, by which instead of punishing ourselves by staying here and waiting for them to come in, we ordered their arrest and adjourned until they could be brought under arrest.

Now, I am as slow as anyone would be to inaugurate or perpetuate any system the result of which is to infract any provision of the Constitution or of proper parliamentary government. But I think we ought to hesitate before returning to the old method and adopting a system by which members who are present would be punished, instead of the absentees.

Mr. REED. That is the very point I want investigated. I have refrained from arguing the constitutional proposition, because I thought that would not be proper on the mere question whether this is a matter of privilege or not. The constitutional question is precisely the point I want examined. The remedy for the weakness of the method hitherto adopted by the House for compelling the attendance of members is not to override the existing rule, but to enlarge the rule in such manner as the House may deem wise. In other words, the House is the sole depository of power in respect to this matter; and a minority can not be endowed with plenary powers. The minority can be made by the House a special agent, but it can not be made a general agent. It can be made an agent with powers distinctly specified, but not an agent with indefinite powers.

That is precisely the point I am complaining of——

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman will permit me a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will say to the gentleman that his object can be accomplished in this way. I would not insist on this if it were the first ruling in this direction, but it has been pursued a number of times. I will suggest to the gentleman that we dispose of this now by discharging the warrant, and then the gentleman from Maine can introduce such an amendment to the rules as will cover the question, let it go to the Committee on Rules, be there determined, and reported to the House.

Mr. REED. I am going to say frankly to the Speaker with regard to this matter in its present stage, that the strongest argument against it did not occur to me when it was first presented, or when a previous rule of this kind had been adopted by the House. But it was only after careful examination that I was convinced myself of the objection which lies at the very foundation of the matter, and I am not sure but that the same argument will convince the House of that fact if I can get the matter authoritatively before the Committee on Rules or before the Judiciary Committee or before whomsoever it shall be referred by the House. And I think that examination will induce the Speaker to entertain the question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the status of the pending question. The House some days ago adopted a resolution to send for its absent members and required that the order should remain in force notwithstanding an adjournment of the House. Some days after that the Sergeant-at-Arms filed a report that he had arrested no one, but that telegrams had been sent and that a number of members had made responses to them. At that time the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moved to discharge the order, and on that demanded the previous question. On the question of ordering the previous question the yeas and nays were ordered. That was understood to be a privileged question in itself.

The gentleman from Maine now submits a proposition which relates to that identical question. It can be no higher than that question; in fact it is that question.

The trouble with the proposition of the gentleman from Maine is that it is dealing with the legality of an order when you propose to discharge the order. The time to object to an order as being illegal is when the proposition is made to grant the order, and not when a proposition is pending to dismiss it. The proposition now is to dismiss this order, while the proposition of the gentleman from Maine is to investigate a very important question—the Chair of course frankly makes that statement, that it is a very important question and one which perhaps ought to be thoroughly investigated. But we are proceeding now with a motion to discharge the order. It is a rule which has been enforced I do not know how many times, but at least several times during this and the last Congress. It is a rule which has always heretofore been discharged by unanimous consent. Up to this time no objection has been made to discharge such orders after the purpose sought to be accomplished has been attained. But in this case objection is made.

The Chair can not see that the question presented by the gentleman from Maine is one of superior privilege to the pending question, because it must be borne in mind that the pending question is to discharge a warrant for the arrest of certain members. The question of the gentleman from Maine raises the question of the legality of the warrant. Now, the Chair can not see that that question ought to take precedence of the question of the discharge of a member from custody, or of a warrant for his arrest.

Therefore the Chair thinks the proposition presented by the gentleman from Maine does not in its present status take any priority of or supersede the pending proposition, and can not now be considered.

The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion to discharge the warrant, and on that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the warrant be discharged, and then the gentleman from Maine can introduce his resolution and have it properly referred.

Mr. PICKLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PICKLER. I understand that the yeas and nays are now ordered on this proposition?

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PICKLER. Under the new rule adopted to-day, two members will be indicated by the Chair to make note of the names of members who are present and not voting. My inquiry is this: Will a member who sits in his seat and does not vote have the right to require the tellers to record his name as being present?

The SPEAKER. He has a right to answer "present" on the call of the roll.

Mr. PICKLER. Suppose he does not answer, and the tellers do not note him, has he a right to show that he is present, and for that purpose to have the tellers note him as being present?

The SPEAKER. He can answer "present" when his name is called.

Mr. CATCHINGS. But not afterwards.

Mr. PICKLER. Suppose he does not answer.

The SPEAKER. Of course after the roll call he can not answer, unless he has been noted. Then his name will be called, and he can vote.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I should like to suggest to the gentleman from South Dakota a way out of this difficulty. He can get up and ask to be counted.

Mr. PICKLER. But, Mr. Speaker, suppose for instance——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rather rule upon the question when it arises than to decide a supposititious case.

Mr. PICKLER. But suppose a member intends to vote, and goes into the cloakroom, and his name is called while he is absent from the Hall of the House, then has he a right to come in and vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer not to decide the case before it arises. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks unanimous consent that the warrant be discharged.

Mr. PICKLER and Mr. PAYNE objected.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is on ordering the previous question, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. DOCKERY, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. COGSWELL. The tellers will please take their places at the desk.

The tellers took their places at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the previous question on the motion to discharge the warrant. As many as favor ordering the previous question will, when their names are called, say aye, those opposed no; and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk began the calling of the roll.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I make the point of order that there is so much confusion that it is impossible to hear the roll call.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

The Clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 226, nays 4, answered "present" 2, not voting 121; as follows:

YEAS—226.

The roll was called the first time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the names of those gentlemen who failed to respond on the first call.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I submit the point of order that under the new rule this second call can not be had unless a quorum has not voted. Then the names are to be reported by the tellers to the Speaker and that list is to be called; and that is the only second call that can be had. I submit that point of order.

The SPEAKER. That is done after the completion of the roll call. It is not meant to interfere with the usual roll call.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me read the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may read the rule.

Mr. LIVINGSTON (reading):

If a quorum does not respond on a roll call, then the names of those so noted as present shall be reported to the Speaker, who shall cause the list to be called from the Clerk's desk and recorded in the Journal.

Mr. HATCH. That is the rule, Mr. Speaker, provided for by the former rule.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now wait until I get through. There is only one roll call, and then the next proposition is that those who are present and have not voted shall be noted by the tellers as present and shall be reported to the Speaker, who shall cause the list to be called from the Clerk's desk, providing there is no quorum. That is the plain rule. Then go to the bottom of the new rule and it reads thus:

Members noted may record their votes—

That is the opportunity, in lieu of the old second call of the roll, for members to record their votes—notwithstanding the provisions of clause 1 of this rule.

Now, if the ruling be correct, we have three chances to record votes instead of two. This new rule leaves out the second roll call, and while the list reported by the tellers is being read it gives members a second chance to be recorded, as the old rule gave them.

The SPEAKER. The rule was not designed, the Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia and to the House, to interfere with the roll call at all. The Chair will call attention to the first clause of Rule XV:

1. Upon every roll call the names of the members shall be called alphabetically by surname, except when two or more have the same surname, in which case the name of the State shall be added; and if there be two such members from the same State, the whole name shall be called; and after the roll has been once called, the Clerk shall call in their alphabetical order the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, that Rule XV applies to the second clause of the rule as adopted this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. That roll call follows the identical words provided in the first clause of Rule XV, and the roll call as provided in that clause consists of two calls. That was not intended to be changed; but it was intended to permit those gentlemen who were noted as present and not voting to vote when their names are called from the Clerk's desk for verification and that the House might see that they are actually present. The Clerk will call the roll again.

The Clerk called the roll a second time.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 226, the noes are 5; and two gentlemen have answered "present." The ayes have it, and the previous question is ordered. The question is now on the main question.

The question was taken; and the motion of Mr. SPRINGER to discharge the warrants was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I was requested by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. MORGAN, to state that he was called to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, and it was impossible for him to be here.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. TARSNEY, is detained by sickness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The call of committees having been concluded,

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BAILEY in the chair.

The title of the bill before the Committee of the Whole as unfinished business was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6016) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over for the present. The chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post-Roads [Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina], who has charge of the bill, is away under the order of the House, as a member of the committee appointed to escort the remains of Senator Vance to his late home in North Carolina.

There being no objection, the bill was passed over for the present.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill upon the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6108) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in the preparation of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill the Committee on Foreign Affairs has endeavored to adhere closely to existing law. We believe that the diplomatic and consular service should be maintained in accordance with the economy usually practiced under our system of government. We think that there should not be extravagance and that there should not be parsimony, but that there should be, in preparing this appropriation bill, fairness, justice, and conservatism.

The bill under consideration appropriates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, $1,513,738.70. The appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, amounted to $1,560,445. The decrease, therefore, in the accompanying bill as reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs is $46,706.24.

It is proper that I should state that while we give millions of dollars in the other appropriation bills, yet our consular service at the present time is self-sustaining. The consular fees collected from the foreign service amounted in the last fiscal year to $1,009,030.26. The amount collected will probably increase each year as we proceed, and therefore the net cost of the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, will probably be less than $500,000. I know of no other great nation in the world that maintains its diplomatic and consular service for so small an amount of money as we do in this country—the entire expense being less than a half million of dollars per annum, when we take into consideration the amount received in the way of fees from our consular service.

The bill under consideration contains few changes, and all the changes have been carefully considered and matured by the committee. The bill, as I have said before, is drawn as closely as possible in accordance with the existing law.

I do not know what time will be desired by gentlemen for the discussion of the bill, or whether any of them desire to speak. If there is no desire for further discussion I would ask unanimous consent that the general debate be closed and that we read the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HITT. What is the suggestion of the gentleman?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Does my colleague desire to be heard?

Mr. HITT. I should like to occupy a short time.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman kindly indicate what time?

Mr. HITT. I would rather not make an arrangement at present about the time.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Very well; then I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, this consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, which is an annual one, and similar to those we have had in all the past Congresses, has not much merit or demerit about it. Perhaps its merit is that it does not take the course followed by its predecessors in making purposely an inadequate provision for the service. That has been done in the House, as all the older members here know very well, for many years, with the expectation that the Senate would make up the deficiency, and that the House would agree in conference afterwards to the additions.

PRETENSES OF ECONOMY.

The reason for this has been that the House for many years has generally been Democratic, while the Senate has generally been Republican; and it being the desire of the Democratic House to make a record of economic legislation for electioneering purposes, the Committee on Foreign Affairs brought in a bill providing in very scant terms for the public service abroad in both consular and diplomatic branches. The House passed it, and each member then went over to the Republican Senate and tried to have the amendments he desired incorporated in the bill; and they were generally made. Then in conference the House assented to the additions.

This has occurred in nearly every Congress for many years; as you recollect, it was done to the worst extent in the last Congress, when the bill brought into the House cut down the provision necessary to support the service about 20 or 25 per cent, and in some cases 50 per cent. Now the Senate is Democratic also, and there is no apparent reason for this parade of frugality; and this bill provides a fair compensation for most consuls. But the trail of the old serpent of ostensible retrenchment can still be seen in parts of this bill, and the force of habit can not be overcome at once. It took time and long debate for this Congress to reach the crisis seen this morning of surrendering to the statesman from Maine [Mr. REED], and adopting the well-tried method of legislation by counting a quorum, and it will take time for the Democratic party to learn to legislate fairly for their own Administration; to appropriate for their own officeholders at a fair rate.

SHORT "CLERK HIRE."

Here is one instance in this bill, not touching salaries, for nearly every consul who gets a salary has a friend here to look out for him but touching that general item called clerk hire, which provides a lump sum for expenditure by the Department in every one of the consulates. The Secretary, in the estimates sent in when Congress opens, always asks Congress to give a certain amount for this purpose. Last year it was $25,000, which was expended. The present Secretary, desiring to comply with the manifest disposition of the House to limit and specify the appropriations as closely as possible for each office, in his estimates, designated fourteen of the consulates, that previously were provided for out of the general lump appropriation, and estimated for them in specific amounts, some $600, some $800. These amounted to about $9,000 in all. He then requested that Congress give him only $20,000 instead of $25,000, as the general lump sum for clerk hire for the remainder of the hundreds of consulates. Now, the committee took him at his word as to the last part, and only gave him $20,000 for the lump sum to distribute, but dropped out and ignored all the items for the fourteen offices that were to be provided for in specific appropriations. It is expected by the very gentleman who framed this bill that this will be corrected in the Senate, and he expects to assent to that change, instead of inserting it now, as it ought to be done.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES SKIMPED.

Take another item, the contingent expenses of consulates, $150,000. That is a large and a vague sum. There is no one specially interested in it. It only concerns the public interest, not any particular politician or officeholder's salary. The Secretary asks for $200,000, for the contingent expenses of all the consulates we have in the world. Now, the committee have given him only $150,000.

There are 799 United States consular offices—249 principal salaried, 91 principal unsalaried, and 459 consular agents. There are nineteen items of contingent expense for these offices—rent, furniture, stationery, postage, etc. The rent paid last year was $83,000, and they are poorly enough cared for. The postage was $26,000. This is in the work for which consulates were created, to encourage trade by communicating necessary information to those merchants interested and inquiring about markets. A new broom always sweeps clean, or attempts to.

A new Secretary always tries to be economical. All new functionaries are reformers, or profess to be; yet last year the new Secretary of State was compelled to expend for this very item of contingent expenses $196,000. The year before last it was $228,000. The year before that it was $228,000, and now the committee give only $150,000 in this bill, knowing that it can not suffice.

Why, take that item of rent. The old general law provides that the consul may be allowed for rent a sum equal to 20 per cent of the amount paid him for salary. That, under the law, would require $101,000 per annum for the rent of consulates. By economy, by disallowance, the Department has reduced the amount so that we expended last year only $83,000 for this purpose. Postage amounted to $26,000. If this bill should pass in its present form it would leave only a little over $40,000 for all the other seventeen items of the long list called contingent expenses—blank books, stationery, furniture, etc. I will not enumerate them all. They are business details. But recollect that the part of this bill which provides for contingent expenses, such as postage, rent, etc., is the one thing that is purely and simply the absolute requisite for the essential business of the Government.

You can cut down salaries; that simply makes an officeholder live more economically, and sometimes it is possible—such a thing is dreamed of—he may resign: but when you take away the clerk hire for the work in the great offices where merchants are pressing with their business, where the ship is about to sail, where invoices are piled up, where the consul can not possibly get the work done in time, because you will not allow a few dollars for clerk hire, you obstruct and injure the trade of our merchants; you delay them for weeks till the next sailing day; you cripple the business of the United States.

Through these consulates last year passed $776,000,000 of commerce on its way to our ports. This little sum for contingencies is not taken from the Treasury or the taxpayer. Those very offices where this allowance is cut off are the ones that returned to the Treasury over a million dollars of revenue, far above what they cost. This is the kind of economy this bill shows. It is in the part that most concerns the business of the country, the very thing for which we have consuls.

WHAT DO CONSULS NOW DO?

And here let me explain some features of our consular system. A consul is now no longer what the word consul meant long ago, when the office was established by other nations. In our most important consular posts he no longer exercises the functions for which that officer was created—that is, the protection of the lives, property, and privileges of the people of his country.

In most cases a consul is to-day simply a Treasury agent in some commercial city, and his aid in highly civilized countries is rarely needed for the safety or protection of American citizens. Besides certifying invoices, about all he does is to perform notarial duties, for which he gets fees which he retains. The fees for verifying invoices of goods coming to the United States are turned into the Treasury. That is about all there is of a consul now, and in the great cities like Paris, London, Liverpool, etc., he is the merest shadow of the original thing called a consul; his true consular duties have disappeared, because they are no longer necessary. Law is justly administered and Americans are safe in their rights without his aid. But in such cities our consuls get the highest pay. In less civilized countries, where they are really needed as protecting consuls, they are paid very little.

WHAT THEY USED TO DO.

Consuls were first sent out by the merchants themselves.

Then, by their influence the European governments were constrained to send out intelligent men as official representatives, stationed in foreign ports and places far away, chiefly in the East, where they could protect traders and seamen, and any of their countrymen amid the uncertainties of feebly administered law, the arbitrary action of petty tyrants and the violence of disorderly regions. There is little of that now and little care given to it. Our consular officers in remote countries where consular duties, as originally understood, are to be performed, are the most wretchedly paid of all, and the greater part of them are not American citizens at all, but residents of those countries. They only receive a pitiful sum in fees, which are small because our trade there is small—pay so slender that no American will have the office. So that when you travel in a country where law is badly administered, where there is disorder, where there is need of the flag and the strong arm of your country to protect you, if you seek out your consul you find a foreigner, who often can not speak English, to tell you what protection you are entitled to.

SALARIES GRADED BY FEES.

The rule in our system, generally followed in fixing pay, is to give a salary proportioned to the fees where they are large, as in the great cities from which we import, and in places where the fees for certifying invoices, $2.50 per invoice, are small—$1,000 or less—we pay him no salary, but let him retain the fees. In scores of places the consuls only get $100 to $500. Of course these places are filled by appointing residents, that is, foreigners, to be American consular officers.

Long ago, when they were first established by civilized governments, it was because of the need of them for protection. Remember the public law of the world was, to put it briefly, that the stranger was an enemy or open to be despoiled. Whenever a foreigner died in any land his property was taken possession of at once—confiscated, as we would consider it in the light of our present Christian civilization. That was the usage of the ancient world, and for centuries it was so in modern Europe.

That was the reason why consuls were first appointed to the Levantine ports and afterwards to all commercial cities. Why, it was only two hundred years ago that prayers were offered up publicly in churches along the North Sea coast "that God would graciously send on our coast many shipwrecks," this in order that these prayerful souls might plunder them; for it was regarded as perfectly legitimate to strip any victim who came into their hands. Now, Americans who go abroad do not fear such enemies, nothing fiercer than hackmen and hotel-keepers. They only go to a consulate to execute some paper, a deed or affidavit to be sent home, for which they pay a pretty round fee. The consul is to them merely a sort of notary public, and his steady business is signing certificates to invoices.

HOW OUR CONSULS BEGAN.

Now, our service, if I am not wearying you with this talk, sprung up in the most accidental, casual way in the world. It is not a system to-day. It never was. There is no method in it. It was not originally established by law. Why, there were a score of consuls out all over the world, appointed by Washington, before the first act was passed, in 1792; and, by the way, it was passed immediately after the first act of American legislation, the tariff law of Washington, for the protection and encouragement of American manufactures.

As a tariff of duties was collected on merchandise imported into the country, invoices or bills of the goods at the ports from which they came, setting out their character and value, were required of importers so as to determine how much duty should be collected on them at our custom-houses. Consuls were sent out to verify these invoices, examining and certifying to their truth before the goods started for the United States. They were allowed a fee on each invoice. That was all they were paid.

In that way our consular service started, without plan or system, and it went on in the most supremely happy-go-lucky fashion—no principle or rule of appointment, or promotions, or grades, or tenure or pay, or functions, or respective authority. It was like a wild tree; it came up spontaneously. The consuls only received the fees—no salaries. But the fees became more and more unequal. Some consuls made fortunes, $50,000 a year; others got little or nothing.

Why, Mr. Speaker, President Pierce appointed his friend Hawthorne consul at Liverpool, after writing a campaign biography of Pierce—the best office in his gift. Had all the favored consuls been Hawthornes it would be ungracious to find fault, for every American who reads and appreciates the work of that exquisite and original genius, owes a debt for the delight he has given to our better nature, and we admit that his splendid contribution to the common glory of the American name earned more than all the fees he received at Liverpool.

Yet these great cities where our principal and best paid consuls are sent are the very places where American citizens do not need protection. The laws there are well administered and protect the rights of Americans as well as their own people. At posts in other countries, where there was little that deserved the name of law and where administration was bad, where men's rights were uncertain and American citizens often sorely needed protection from lawlessness, there being less commerce with this country, there was little pay in fees; and so the consul was starved or we could not keep an American there as consul at all, and had some foreigner acting as agent.

WHAT THEY OUGHT TO DO.

Now, I think the duty of a consul is to protect something greater and nobler than Treasury revenues; it is to protect American citizens. A man is more important than a dollar. But the pay in fact was inversely to the necessity of a consul. Our system, if it be a system, has always proceeded backwards. The law of 1856 was the first one that attempted to introduce something like system, but the classifications were without meaning or practical value, for there was no promotion from grade to grade, no fixity of tenure, little regard in compensation to the character of the duties, no provision, either in the theory or in the practice afterwards, for rewarding a man who showed signal ability in a post of difficulty by promoting him to a higher and more responsible post. The higher post was always the one of less responsibility and less difficulty, and the ambition of a consul in trying for a better position was to get one of larger pay in a great city, where he would probably meet no question of duty that would test his ability at all.

WHY A GOOD OFFICER QUITS.

There is no provision for recognizing zeal and efficiency. I knew a consul—Mr. Dyer, at Odessa—who with American energy and zeal employed all the time he could spare in urging upon the merchants and people there the use of American goods and manufactures, of which he induced houses here to send small ventures. His work was quickly recognized by our merchants. It was plain that such a man would be wanted by them. I assured him that I would endeavor to have his salary raised, and it was raised, I believe, $500; but it was too late; he was offered much more than his salary by merchants to go elsewhere in Europe introducing American goods, and of course he left the service, where such men are most wanted. I know a similar case of one our consuls in Germany, who gathered samples of our manufactures and food products and advanced their popularity and sale at once. I am sorry to say that he soon went out of office owing to a change of Administration.

Now, the risk of immediate removal is such that you can not expect to keep a good consul.

DANGEROUS PROMOTION REFUSED.

We have in the service now thirteen consular clerks that you can not remove except for cause. They have been at their posts a long time and have become well trained. They are familiar with the languages, usages, laws, and commercial customs of the countries in which they are serving, with the methods of business and the regulations of the State Department. Their salary is at first $1,000, and they can reach $1,200, but no higher. One of them, Mr. Scidmore, in Japan, is the author of an excellent book on the United States Ministerial and Consular Courts, for our ministers and consular officers there are judges.

Now, some years ago there was a vacancy in a consulate there, where he had been assigned as clerk. He was getting $1,200, and that consulate was worth $4,000 a year. Word reached him that the Department intended to appoint him consul; and in fact he was well qualified by experience and recognized ability. He immediately wrote me an urgent letter asking me to go to the Department and prevent it. Why? He knew that if appointed to a fat consulate, where the salary was $4,000, he would soon be turned out. Office-seekers with strong backing would soon find the good place filled by a man who had no political support. They would at once be upon him.

There is no finical delicacy about office-seekers. They go for the office; and the race is to the one who shall first get it. He knew that he would not have lasted a year, and he wisely kept out of it. He is in the service to-day, and an excellent officer, working for $1,200 a year. I have a letter lying before me from a consul who states that he heard the pay at his post was to be raised to nearly double, and he wrote me to "stop it if you can. I have no political backing to maintain myself, and if this were made a good salary I would soon lose it. Please let it alone." It is this danger of immediate removal from the service which has so much crippled the efficiency of our consular service.

GREAT RUSH FOR FEW PLACES.

The pressure for such a post is practically irresistible to a Secretary of State or President. The popular impression is that there is a vast and indefinite number of consulates, delightful places of residence in foreign countries, and many Americans, especially those who talk most of their love of country, are eager to get away from their country and live abroad. The vague impression is that there is little to do and that little rather pleasant, with a glamour of distinction about it: that the social life is something very fine, realizing what people read in novels and magazines of a world of which they have seen nothing; and that the whole is snugly paid for by Uncle Sam.

As a matter of fact there are not 150 American consulates in all the world where the pay is above $1,500. That is all you gentlemen of the Democratic side have to divide up among you. Three-fourths of the places in the long list of consuls and consular agencies are paid trifling fees, or so small that no man with a family could live upon it half as well as the average American lives at home. So when a political change comes and all this fierce multitude of strongly backed applicants press upon the President and Secretary, they concentrate upon the few offices that are found on examination of the list to have fair salaries attached.

This has often produced changes, sometimes violent fluctuations in the men in this service, often with bad effect.

AMERICANS MAKE GOOD OFFICERS.

It is easy to point out the faults in our service and its methods. They lie right on the surface. But it is due to the men who have been employed in the service to say that many of them were the equals of the consular officers of any other country in the world; in many respects superior to their colleagues. This merit of the men is simply owing to the fact that they are Americans, and owing to general intelligence, familiarity with politics, and public business and the strong development of individuality among our people, they are generally energetic, prompt, and efficient men. There are many instances in our past where a consular officer without long experience has in trying and responsible moments shown decision, intelligence, and grasp that were gratifying to the Government and the people at home.

I know some critics, earnest for reform, say our service is all bad and discreditable, and have long said so. It is true, many consuls have been men who had taken an interest in politics at home, and politicians being the servants of the people and their creations, are regarded as fair game for popular criticism and especially for newspaper criticism. But is it not generally true in any popular government, in our Republic, as it was in the ancient democracies, that the man who takes an interest in public affairs is very apt to be one of the brightest minds in the crowd? Our officials from that class have, as a general rule, been intelligent, vigorous, capable men. Being a politician is no discredit in itself. Being familiar with the public affairs of their country ought not to be counted against these men. It is the system of sudden appointment and removal that has so often worked wrong. The service has real merit; but the merit of the service lies, not in the method of appointment or in the method of removal, but in the inherent elements of the American character, in the intelligence and energy which so generally pervade our people.

POLITICIANS SUCCESSFUL DIPLOMATS.

Why, our foreign ministers have been politicians and I am not ashamed of them. Many of them have gone from this House, some of the most eminent in our history. Take one who served here for a long time—several old members will recollect him—Gen. Schenck, who was minister to England. At the very time when he was the target for mockery and for criticism at home, not only by his political opponents but by members of his own party, I heard one of the first men in public life in Europe say that Gen. Schenck was without a peer in the whole diplomatic corps in London, in ability, in breadth of view, quickness, and strength of mind. That man was trained in this House—a politician. So too, Kasson, Phelps, McLane, Cox, Morton, eminent for success in diplomacy, went from this House.

The book on international law of highest credit was written by an American minister, Henry Wheaton.

A GRAND, BRAVE MINISTER.

Another man who served in this Hall so long that he was called the father of the House, Elihu Washburne, went as minister to France. There was an instance of a pure politician turned diplomat, a fair subject for the newspaper critics, yet Washburne as a minister displayed more of the highest qualities of a diplomat than any other minister at the capital to which he was accredited. Amid the storm of the Franco-Prussian war and the horrors of the Commune he protected under our flag hundreds of his countrymen, millions of property, shielded tens of thousands of Germans in the greatest trouble and peril.

When the first peal of that awful cannonade burst upon Paris all the other diplomats, every one of the lords and counts and marquises hurried away; Washburne stayed—stayed through it all. The stars and garters all disappeared, but the Stars and Stripes stood fast. [Applause.] His house was pierced with shot. The bombshells fell all about the legation, but he never failed one day nor one hour from his post. He had the respect and the confidence of both the French and German Governments when they trusted no one else. For weeks he was the only means of communication between the contending forces—a dignified, courageous, discreet American minister.

WANT OF CONSISTENT FIXED POLICY.

Both our consuls and our ministers at these distant posts would be more efficient if they were always certain of vigorous support at home; if there was a definite policy unflinchingly followed from ten years to ten years on general questions, and in regard to each country and every important interest, instead of the fluctuations that come with changed political control at Washington. These changes make our representative uncertain both as to the policy that may be followed or adopted at home, and uncertain whether he is to remain longer at his post.

That has caused a great deal of trouble. Our consul at Bluefields has been in trouble for the last three months, not knowing which way to turn, not knowing what was the policy of his own Government, while the English consul there has been steadily pressing English interests up to the very verge of right. The British system is very different from ours. Their consuls are kept continuously in the service.

HOW JOHN BULL TEACHES RESPECT.

The English, by their clear and pertinacious pursuit of their interests on definite lines of policy in every city and island scattered around the world, and by the inflexible armed support they instantly give to their consular officers, have established all over the globe the unrivalled prestige of the English name and secured the first advantages for English interests. They do not count cost nor peril when a decisive question comes. For instance, in Abyssinia, not many years ago, a few British subjects, scarcely more than a dozen, were outraged, the consul insulted, and the British flag dishonored by King Theodore, who thought himself secure in that remote mountain kingdom; but the British Government at the call of the imprisoned consul summoned regiments and fleets from India and from England, concentrated a powerful force on the eastern coast of Africa, crossed the desert, building a railway as they went, climbed the mountains, driving back his troops, captured his posts, stormed his fortress capital, burned his palace, and slew him in its ashes: and all to deliver a score of Englishmen and teach the world that there was no spot so remote or inaccessible and no king so insolent as to be secure in insulting a British consul who was covered by the Union Jack.

It taught 500,000,000 people, it taught a hundred scattered nations that when a consul of Great Britain took his stand, he would be backed by his home Government even though it did increase taxes and even though it did require an army of 32,000 British soldiers.

HOW OUR ADMINISTRATION DEFAMES A MINISTER.

When, on the other hand, an American minister in Hawaii, to protect his fellow citizens, amid violence, tumult, and revolution, landed a body of marines and saved American life and property, his home Government suddenly changed in politics and policy. Instead of standing by him, it first hunted secretly during months to find grounds or excuse for suspicion, then came out with a public declaration of disapproval, then a President's message, and a general flood of defamation of an American minister. Now, when that is the reward of a faithful representative of his country, how can a minister, even one as experienced, cautious, and honest as was Minister Stevens, go confidently forward in the discharge of his functions, if he never can tell what is to be the policy of the Government at home? How can he know whether his most praisworthy and patriotic act may not be the theme of detraction, and a rancorous President's message, and censorious resolutions which the President may want to have passed? It is a poor solace that posterity will find out the truth and vindicate him.

BUT THE SENATE VINDICATES HIM.

Fortunately Minister Stevens did not have to wait so long for fair investigation and judgment.

The Senate overtook posterity this time; and after a thorough examination of all the facts his complete vindication has been made public by a committee of gentlemen, the Chairman, Senator MORGAN, a leading Democrat, whose position in public life and in party organization is such that their report has commanded universal attention and respect. They justify Minister Stevens, and show that he did not go as far as international law and his duty authorized him to go in his action at Honolulu.

CAN THE SERVICE BE BETTERED?

I was speaking of the service and its faults; and I have mentioned its merits in all fairness. Is there any cure for these faults? I believe that much can be done to better the service. I mentioned those consular clerks. See how ably men will work for their country—work hard and faithfully and for very little pay if they are recognized and retained.

Those consular clerks are a good instance of what could be done for all the lower parts of the service. It is useless to talk about the great places—the large, official plums. They are pretty certain to be changed after elections; and you can not very well control them. Perhaps, it is best not to try. But we could employ young Americans in subordinate positions; and salaries of $300, $400 or $500 would be accepted by these young men upon entering the service, if they were certain that they could receive better employment and pay on proving themselves worthy. They could be trained in the technical duties of the consulates, the most important languages, the commercial legislation of the principal trading countries, and that body of customs and traditions which have so much to do with human affairs. Their number could be gradually extended, and this would become a nursery from which to select efficient consuls. At present the consular clerks shrink from consular appointments, from which they would soon be turned out.

But I doubt whether the civil service reform can be engrafted here.

CAN NOT APPLY CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

It would be hopeless to attempt to apply it at once to the whole service, for the people would not support it. In a vague fashion both parties have for twenty years put forth general declarations approaching civil service reform or favoring its most important principles; but when you reach the voters by millions they seem indifferent to the subject, and those most actively interested in public affairs, when it comes to the pinch, are against the real practical adoption of the system in its rigidity. Especially is this the feeling with regard to lucrative posts, which almost everyone, when it comes to action, thinks should be changed with the majority.

Americans seem to have a notion that each should have his turn when a good thing is to be had. Take the elections to county offices all over this country, where the duties are simple and the pay makes them desirable. The fact that a man has been sheriff or county clerk for two or three terms, no matter what his personal merit or character, is urged against his continuance.

They do not generally hold the same rule as to offices of responsibility rather than pay, where the contrary rule is thought advantageous. It has been often said that the South before the war gained great advantages over the North in Congress because they continued their members instead of changing to new ones. Every one in the House knows what an immense influence the Philadelphia members have exerted for a score of years in this Hall. Long service gives them great advantage, and Philadelphia reëlected her Kelleys, Randalls, O'Neills, and Binghams. But even where the people continue men long in places of high trust, they want them to be within reach, not irremovable, nor in long terms, but requiring frequent reëlection to remind them of the popular will. Right there lies a feeling widely extended among our people and it has a wide basis; they are jealous of a class of permanent officers, and have an apprehension that they are not as efficient, that they become indolent and altogether too independent.

PLAYING FOURTH-OF-JULY BASEBALL IN AUGUST.

Our functionaries all over this country who are dependent upon popular will, are prompt, obliging, and generally energetic, though they may not always be experienced men. Nor are the people so far off in their opinion that a class of fixed officeholders may become as parts of a mere routine. For several years, while in the legation at Paris, I had some opportunity to observe the workings of departments where the officeholders, except the very highest, are substantially permanent. While they were methodical and accurate, they were slow beyond the conception of an American. Take an example: One day in the beginning of June a young man from the American students in the Latin Quarter came to the legation and requested a permit for their baseball club to play a game of baseball on the Fourth of July approaching, in the great park just west of the city, the Bois de Boulogne.

Our minister sent a letter within half an hour to the minister of foreign affairs, which was the only method by which he communicated with the Government, for permission for the young men to play the national game in this public park on the Fourth of July. No reply was received until the 24th of August, when the legation was answered in the most courteous form of elegant phrase. What had been done? The minister of foreign affairs, on receiving the request of the distinguished minister, for whom he had such esteem, requesting that the young gentlemen of a friendly nation should play their national game in the public park, had lost no time in communicating with his honorable colleague, the minister of public works, to whose functions the subject more particularly belonged, and the minister of public works, animated by the same friendly sentiments, had hastened to communicate with the prefect of the Seine, and the prefect of the Seine had, without delay, communicated the request to the government of the city of Paris. Then it had gone to the director of parks and promenades, and the director of these works, inflamed with the same friendly zeal, had written an admirable communication to the superintendent of parks of the western division, and the superintendent had hurried to consult the administration of the Bois de Boulogne, which had with all expedition called upon the contractor for the grass, who had promptly answered that he responded to this request on behalf of the young gentlemen of a friendly people by placing everything at their disposal, with the sole condition that they should give a bond of indemnity for any damage to the grass. [Laughter.]

And this response, duly approved and hastened forward, with a few days interval between letters, through all the stages of this admirably adjusted circumlocution office, came back through the minister of foreign affairs, who took pleasure in saying that as an evidence of his high regard for the American minister the Government would take his mere request as sufficient voucher, without bond, and the young gentlemen were at perfect liberty to play their national Fourth of July game on the 24th of August! [Renewed laughter.] It is not likely that such a correspondence or anything similar in spirit could have occurred with the officials of any county, State, or department in the United States. Americans are not made that way, nor would officials who followed such bureaucratic routine remain long on duty if Congressmen or the people could get at them.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HITT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that all of that "red tape" grew out of the fact that that is an old government, with old forms, that have come down out of the ages, and the "red tape" is not to be attributed to civil service at all?

Mr. HITT. The Government of France is old in its origin; but it has been shaken up more violently and renewed more completely than ours has ever been. In mere administration it is considered almost an ideal government in method, for that nation has the genius of method in excess of all the others that I have ever known.

Mr. MILLIKEN. As far as that is concerned, our own age goes back to our origin. That is so with all nations.

Mr. HITT. I said that Government is old as to its origin—the centuries of its existence.

There is a good as well as a doubtful side to this whole question of the service abroad. Though ours may be very irregular, it is vigorous.

TRAIN OUR OWN MEN—NO FOREIGNERS WANTED.

Our people may not be willing to adopt the civil-service system completely for a long time, but the law ought to be strengthened to retain efficient men. A nursery from which to select, and a system of promotion by which to reward them ought to be provided by law. The present statute, with all its classifications, is utterly without real meaning, for men are appointed or removed from all posts without regard to the others.

The pay of the consuls in the minor posts, which are the most numerous, ought to be increased and fixed—not uncertain fees. At present the consular representatives in a great portion of them are foreigners, the compensation being so petty that no American can go out to hold them. The consular agent is generally a merchant, sometimes a subject of the country, sometimes an Englishman doing business there, who incidentally takes charge of American interests. Here is another way in which the consular system seems to be inverted, and it works right against our interests.

The man in charge of American trade and the American flag who is a foreigner, owes his first allegiance to another flag and is generally engaged in a rival trade. As a consular officer certifying invoices he sees all the shipments and all the prices, in fact, all the details of the business of other business men, who are his rivals. He is an authorized official spy. More than this, as he certifies to his own invoices, it is his interest to put the valuations or prices of goods of his own firm at the lowest possible figure, in order to have to pay a low duty; in other words, his interests are directly hostile to those of the revenue department of the United States. It is a bad, it is an unbusinesslike principle to place a servant in charge of business where his interest is directly the reverse of the employer's. We should have Americans to take charge of the business of their country, and in many of these posts, by a very slight increase of pay, they could be filled efficiently by men like these consular clerks and at little cost.

Young men would be glad to enter the service as consular clerks for far less than a thousand a year, if they knew that they could not be turned out at the next general election and left to pay their passage home from China or New Zealand. A gradual and reasonable increase of pay can not be charged as extravagant for the consular service at present has not cost the Treasury anything whatever. The fees collected and turned into the Treasury by the consuls pay the whole expenditure of the service and have often furnished a considerable surplus; so that it can not be said that the people in the country are taxed to support these officers living abroad in so much imagined luxury.

It is a vicious principle that enters into our service now to have a large part of the consular officers paid wholly by fees. Their pay should be fixed and the fees should be turned into the Government, all of them. Those fees are paid by the foreign exporting merchants and manufacturers in the first instance. The consul who collects them and who certifies to the truth of the prices in the invoices should not at the same time be the merchant who pays the fees and makes the invoices. It should be the interest, as it is the duty, of the consul to have the invoices correct, truthful, with absolutely fair valuations. The way in which invoices are now certified is in need of change and remedy, and there ought to be such rigid inspection provided that the improvement would last.

INVOICES NEARLY WORTHLESS.

Some members of this House are merchants and know of personal knowledge that invoices are in many cases practically worthless as a guide to true values. They are often no more reliable than a newspaper would be folded up and sent with the goods. It is the chief part of the consul's duty now in the principal ports to certify invoices of goods, which goods he is theoretically supposed to have personally examined, so that he can certify their true values on which the duty to be paid is computed—30 per cent, or 50 per cent. The consuls are really Treasury officers instead of consuls in the original meaning of that word. But what is the practical operation? Over $776,000,000 of goods brought last year in the ports of the United States came with invoices duly authenticated by consuls as truthful statements of the real values of the goods at the ports from which they were sent. As a matter of fact when that certificate is attached by the consul it is a mere formal act.

The consul does not, and in the very nature of things he can not, make an examination of the merchandise. He does not attempt it. He does not know even the contents of the packages, to say nothing of the value of each part. As a daily regular fact, he take the statement of the merchant or manufacturer who sends the merchandise, with his declaration of value, and then certifies that the values therein expressed are the true market values in the country of export. The goods come to our port—New York or Boston. The examiner at the custom-house, when the goods are opened, holds the invoice in his hand and rapidly disposes of great varieties of goods, almost always accepting without any change the valuations in the invoices. He knows that if he is criticised for undervaluation he can say "here is the certificate, the official act of an American officer under oath right in the country of manufacture, who has had an opportunity to examine them there and certifies that he has done so."

Take the French line steamer that came in Sunday with perhaps twelve thousand packages of merchandise coming from three or five different markets, all duly invoiced and certified, where the consul could not do the manual work of filling out the certificates alone; he merely put his name and seal to them.

EXAMINERS LITTLE BETTER.

What is the effect? It justifies the examiners in the custom-house and in the appraiser's stores in accepting invoices as expressing the true value of the merchandise—these invoices which are made out by the very men who have to pay the duty estimated upon these valuations, and their interest is to put them down to the lowest point in order to escape the duty. They are misleading and only bad. Take New York, where there is one appraiser and ten assistants, with ninety-two examiners, the goods being divided by the lines of merchandise—metals, silks, woolens, etc.—each assistant having as many examiners as he needs.

Every tenth package, say, is opened, examined, and counted as to quantity. Some of you have seen the examiners going through this process, the invoice always in hand. The consignee or merchant here who receives the goods is supposed to have no voice or influence and to be excluded. In fact they and their agents swarm through the buildings. A high officer of the Treasury Department told me that he found in one day in the New York custom-house "annual pass No. 307" and "daily pass No. 51" of the series for that day, to allow these men to come upon the floors. They get passes for entrance, their ostensible purpose being to hunt up some package, or hurry up or find some missing articles. Their interest can never be other than to secure the lowest possible classification and valuation.

The examiner leans on the consul and the consular certificate. The consul making his certificate—for he is perhaps poorly paid and has over him no inspection, no watchful superior—leans on the examiner, and between them the goods go through at a lower rate than their actual value, and the revenues are defrauded. All of this proceeding is a discouragement to the honest merchant who pays duties at full rates and who insists naturally that there should be no undervaluation for the benefit of the dishonest or those who will swear to false values.

WILSON BILL WOULD MAKE THIS WORSE.

These evils will be greatly increased if the Wilson bill passes, changing the mode of measuring or estimating the duties to be collected on imports from the present system, by the McKinley law, of generally imposing specific duties—that is, duties on articles measured by the yard or by the pound at fixed rates—to the ad valorem system—that is, counting by the dollars' worth of merchandise, which allows such free opportunity for false statement of values in invoices. We are all interested to prevent such frauds; for, whether we are protectionists or free traders, we all desire that, if the law requires a tariff to be paid, it should be paid by all alike—by the dishonest importer who makes a false statement in his invoice as fully as by the honest merchant who tells the truth.

OLD FAULTS IN OUR SYSTEM.

There will inevitably be weak parts in any system as vast as our revenue department, but that part of it which springs from consular action is manifestly defective, and the remedy would be to increase the consular office force, and then, more important than that, to have a thorough, general, and frequent system of rigid inspection throughout the consulates. At present there is none at all; and right here how plain is the immense importance of having experienced, vigilant, strong, and faithful men at these consular posts from which our great current of importations comes. For after all, the main trouble is that we do not carefully examine the men who are appointed.

I have said before that good ones and bad ones have been appointed in the past, because both parties have included and considered political reasons in making appointments. But of late this has been carried to a degree never before dreamed of. The whole service has been revolutionized within a few months, and our consulates now, all around the world, are filled with raw hands, many of whom are inefficient. I do not know this of my own personal knowledge, but I have been told it by gentlemen who are in the confidence and who are very warm friends of those in power.

A GREAT REFORMER, QUINCY, APPEARS.

A gentleman who was thought to be specially fitted, to be equipped in an extraordinary manner for the work of reforming and bettering the Government generally, was chosen and put, as we may say, over the Secretary of State, that he might improve the consular service of the United States. I refer to Mr. Quincy, of Massachusetts. [Laughter on the Republican side.] That gentleman came here with a newspaper announcement of his character worth recalling: "A Democrat whose intellectual astuteness had mastered the apparently simple problem that the great masses of the American people desire courageous and bold reforms in political matters; and, more yet, a man whose conscience would compel him to courageous and lofty patriotism calmly abiding the consequences."

He was a gentleman whose high thoughts dwelt in the serene upper air, but whose great faculties for once were bent to common things. He undertook the reform of the consular service by removing those unfit and putting in those whom he chose to designate. This was the man who was intrusted with that wide authority by the President, who we all know is a great reformer.

HIS WILD DEBAUCH AMONG THE CONSULSHIPS.

What is the result? I do not wish to criticise his work lest mine be thought a Republican or partisan view; but taking the authority of the leading and most dignified Democratic paper in New York, I will read a few words about Mr. Cleveland's chosen instrument of reform:

Mr. Quincy has been allowed a debauch among the consulships. He has sent out to look after our trade in the uttermost ends of the earth the usual quota of broken-down men and ignorant editors, who will, of course, if partly through the discredit of them the Democrats should lose the next election, be remorselessly cast adrift at their posts, and many of them will have to "beat" their way home, to our further disgrace.

That is from the New York Evening Post, which I believe is a special admirer of the President, and is always a well-informed, able journal.

That, according to so eminent an organ of the party in power, is the condition to which they have brought the consular service of the United States.

Yes, it is through abuse of the power of appointment that the trouble creeps in and the service is debased. I do not deny that there have been improper appointments at many times in the past sixty years since Gen. Jackson initiated our political system; improper appointments by both parties; but heretofore there has been resistance on the part of the Secretary of State and the President to the making of profligate, worthless appointments. They have tried to preserve their self-respect. They selected from those pressed upon them the best and fittest they could, and they secured many excellent men. Never before have we seen the appointing power brought to the pass now witnessed, nor used as it has been for the humiliating and debasing purposes to-day described by this high authority.

THE VAN ALEN SALE OF THE ITALIAN MISSION.

Not alone the consular service, but the diplomatic service, which has usually been regarded as something that must be respected, for each man in that service represents the whole people, has been filled by new methods and for new reasons.

We had a man appointed to Italy, where our embassy is very important, under circumstances that drew the attention of the whole country. A man named J. J. Van Alen, who is said to be wealthy, but who is unknown to diplomacy or to politics, unheard of in public affairs, was appointed not a great while ago minister to Italy.

The place has since become an embassy. Mr. Van Alen had but one man to recommend him, as is stated by those who are entitled to belief. The gentleman who recommended him was one who wields great power, one who was the nearest friend to the President of the United States, and the man to whom the President owes his own office more than he owes it to any other individual living man. Between this gentleman, Mr. William C. Whitney, and Mr. Van Alen there had been some business. Mr. Van Alen had paid to Mr. Whitney, for the party, to elect Mr. Cleveland, $50,000.

And Mr. Whitney, in his letter to the President calling upon him for the appointment, directing attention to his merits, said:

There is additional reason for appointing him, that as the result of that very generous and cordial support of the party in the late campaign, when friends were few and calls were great, he has been accused of dishonorable bargaining.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. That sounds like Wanamaker.

Mr. HITT. Now, it was somewhat of a pleasant surprise to receive $50,000 "when friends were few and calls were great."

Mr. BURROWS. They are less now.

Mr. HITT. After that, just at the time when the campaign was at a white heat and in the last moment, November 1, when they were running neck and neck, the President made some remarks which attracted attention and the admiration especially of those who regarded him as a truly great and good man. In his address to the business men of New York at the Lenox Lyceum meeting, the 1st of November, just before election, a critical hour that, and at the time when Mr. Whitney was pouring out Van Alen's money to elect Mr. Cleveland, he said:

We daily hear predictions of Republican success, based upon the ability of that party to purchase the votes of the people.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

A little reflection, it seems to me, can not fail to arouse the American conscience to the wickedness, as well as peril, of a debauched suffrage.

Mr. HEPBURN. What do you quote from?

Mr. HITT. From Mr. Cleveland.

It is a plain proposition that our Government is only true to the principles upon which it rests when in its operations it represents the honest and intelligent sentiment of the people. When it does not its vigor and its very life are gone and it remains but the mere semblance of a free Government—the weakest and most deformed plan of rule that ever deluded mankind. It can then no longer defend the rights of all, because rights will be forgotten in the capricious bestowal of favors.

[Laughter.]

There is much more in the same lofty strain which I will not detain the House to read. I am not expressing any criticism upon the man occupying the lofty position of President, for it might be thought that I had a partisan motive, as I belong to another party. But I will now call attention to the words published in the Forum, a very grave journal, by a well-known writer, a long-recognized friend of the President, Mr. Foulke, the reformer, who says:

In the Van Alen case we are confronted with corruption in its most naked form. The President has told us that dollars alone, when given to the right person at the right time, are sufficient to secure as high a place as that of minister to Italy. We are informed that the mission to Rome is for sale, and the President ought not to wonder if we resent the insult. It will not do to lay this at the door of anyone else. We can not relieve the President upon the plea of lack of ordinary information. He made this appointment with his eyes open, and against the protests of his friends; and the people whose offices are thus given over to the methods of the auction mart must hang their heads in shame.

These are not my words, but those of a philosopher, a reformer, a friend of the President reasoning upon the events of the hour. And he asks very pertinently what is the essential nature of such an appointment? It is set out very plainly in a familiar book from which I read, Russell on Crimes, page 214. [Laughter and applause.]

"The taking or giving of a reward for offices of a public nature is said to be bribery," says Bacon's Abridgment. "Concerning the sale of offices of a public nature it has been well observed that nothing can be more palpably prejudicial to the good of the public than to have places of the highest concernment, on the due execution whereof the happiness of both king and people doth depend, disposed of, not to those who are most able to execute them, but to those who are most able to pay for them; nor can anything be a greater discouragement to industry and virtue than to see those places of trust and honor, which ought to be the rewards of those who by their industry and diligence have qualified themselves for them, conferred on those who have no other recommendation but that of being the highest bidders; neither can anything be a greater temptation to officers to abuse their power by bribery and extortion and other acts of injustice than the consideration of the great expense they were at in gaining their places and the necessity of sometimes straining a point to make their bargain answer their expectations."

That law, given in the modern writer Russell, is ancient law. It is taken from Bacon's Abridgment, and dates back to Hawkin's Pleas of the Crown. It is an authority of centuries. I do not wish to dwell upon this incident too long. I will only give the sorrowful comment of this friend of Mr. Cleveland:

It is not pleasant to think that our Chief Magistrate has done a thing which falls so close to the definition of crime that it involves all the public injury and moral wrong so clearly described as the essential quality of a guilty act.

CLEVELAND IMITATED IN ILLINOIS.

Let me mention an illustration of the great influence which a public man of eminent character widely admired has upon the community in which he lives.

Mr. Cleveland has been admired so much that people think whatever he does is right, that that makes it right, especially those who are in the same political organization and who naturally look up for a model that they may imitate. Last November, in the interval between the two sessions of this Congress, I was at home in Illinois, and while at Mount Carroll, near where I live, I saw a case called for trial which vividly recalls the Van Alen incident of higher life—for things are humbler in our country politics, you know. [Laughter.] The incident occurred in the circuit court. A Mr. C. B. Smith had been a candidate on the Democratic ticket for county clerk. That county of Carroll is overwhelmingly Republican and such a candidacy seemed on the face of it utterly hopeless.

A Mr. Henry Tallman is an active and popular Democratic politician out there, of perhaps less elegance in style than the eminent gentleman he recalled, but he is a "hustler from way back." [Laughter.] He told Mr. Smith, the Democratic candidate for county clerk, that if he would agree to appoint him deputy, he would hustle for him, and he thought Mr. Smith would "get there." [Laughter.] The bargain was made and Mr. Tallman so actively and so successfully exerted himself in behalf of Mr. Smith that, to the astonishment of all of us, Mr. Smith was elected. He kept his bargain with the same fidelity that our President, with characteristic tenacity of purpose, displayed in appointing Mr. Van Alen to Italy.

But there came in an intervening incident which disturbed the arrangement. Mr. Smith got married, and he wanted the place for his wife; so he appointed her, telling Tallman to vacate. He had heard how relations are appointed in high politics at Washington. Mr. Tallman demanded that he should be paid damages, heavy damages. He estimated them by a rule somewhat similar to that which must have been in the minds of certain eminent New York friends of the President when they proposed to raise a subscription to pay off Mr. Van Alen, when two gentlemen, whom many of us know, headed it with a subscription of a thousand dollars each to reimburse Mr. Van Alen if he did not get the place. [Laughter.] Upon the same principle Mr. Tallman demanded that he be made whole. He said that Mr. Smith had promised in writing to pay him what was fair—I think the amount was $300. Smith did not do it, and Tallman sued him, and it was the trial of that suit that I saw called. The judge, like the American people in its judgment in the Van Alen case, took a different view. I read from the report of the case:

"Judge Cartwright held that such a contract was void and contrary to public policy, that its tendency was to corrupt the suffrage of the people"—that, you remember, was what Mr. Cleveland dreaded so much in his address at the Lenox Lyceum [laughter]—"and was insufficient to give the plaintiff a standing in court. The jury accordingly found for the defendant." Mr. Berry, the eminent counsel for Tallman, said that he would not have been so confident of winning the suit but for the sale of the Italian mission. [Laughter.] Van Alen was not reimbursed, but appointed according to bargain and Mr. Berry remarked that in his opinion, if Van Alen was entitled to reimbursement if Cleveland failed to carry out his end of the bargain, then why was not his client, Mr. Tallman, who had given time and money in Smith's support entitled to damages when Smith went back on the bargain? [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, it is under these adverse circumstances and new methods of appointment in the consular and diplomatic branches that our service is laboring now. But the remedy is plain. Mr. Van Alen did not go to Italy, and nobody was more relieved by his not going than our worthy President. That whole arrangement was crisped, burned, blown away by the hot, scorching breath of public scorn. The criticism was not from political opponents. Not at all. It was the honest heart of the American people all over this country which rebuked that sordid bargain. I believe the incident will have good effects, for it has called attention to the defects in a great and important branch of our Government which receives little attention, which is unattractive to public men, which does not interest members of Congress, which has grown up, as I said awhile ago, in the merest accidental way for one hundred years, and is therefore full of confusion and disorder.

I hope that the honorable gentleman, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky], will carry out an intimation which I heard him make in private and which he will pardon me for mentioning in this public manner, and bring in a bill providing a commission to reorganize this whole service, to make it independent, to elevate it to a higher standard, so that these officers whose duty it is to protect the liberties, the lives, and the property of our people in their farthest ventures in trade, who guard our missionaries carrying Christianity to the heathen, who all around the world represent the American name, may be enabled to do it still more effectually under the policy and protection of a flag that will be as strong and as respected as the union jack of England. [Applause.]

I think the service ought to be carefully reorganized, and there ought to be a system of inspection introduced and vigilantly carried out, so that these consuls, who last year had charge of a commerce of seven hundred and seventy-six millions of imports into this country, shall be required to be fully qualified for the work, and shall be watched from hour to hour to the end that they discharge faithfully and honestly the high duties committed to them by our Government. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I see that my time has expired. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I do not know whether any other gentleman desires to address the House in general debate; but I would like to reach some agreement with my colleague on the committee [Mr. HITT] as to the time within which general debate shall be closed, so that we may proceed to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] wishes to address the committee very briefly. I know of no one else.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. How much time does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire?

Mr. HITT. Probably not more than fifteen minutes; but I do not think we ought to limit him.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Very well.

Mr. GROW obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania would prefer to speak to-morrow?

Mr. GROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. I will, then, if there be no objection, move that committee rise.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. My object in asking the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] how much time might be desired for general debate, was that after we had reached an agreement, I might make a motion that the committee rise. How much time does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] desire?

Mr. GROW. Not very much.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Half an hour?

Mr. GROW. That will be sufficient.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that we agree to close general debate after one hour more shall be occupied—half an hour on each side.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky, my colleague on the committee, will not press any such proposition as that. I have listened with some surprise to the speech of the honorable gentleman from Illinois; and while it was not my purpose to speak at all on this bill, and I had made no preparation with that view, yet since he has made this political speech I desire to say something myself as a member of the committee; and I do not want to be limited to less than an hour.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I move, then, that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BAILEY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6108) making appropriation for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HALL of Minnesota obtained leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

And then, on motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 18, 1894.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAYERS, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1916) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge Little River in the State of Arkansas.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 1917) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas or in the State of Texas.

A bill (H. R. 5041) to extend the time authorizing the St. Louis and Birmingham Railroad to build a bridge across the Tennessee River at Clifton, Tenn.; and

A bill (H. R. 5356) to authorize the West Braddock Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the Monongahela River, from the borough of Rankin to Mifflin Township.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the International Wood Carvers' Association, of Boston, Mass., and a memorial of the Furniture and Hardwood Finishers' Local Union, No. 2, of St. Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty with China; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of sundry citizens of the United States, praying for the enactment of legislation to suppress the lottery traffic; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of Cotton Hill Camp, No. 619, Modern Woodmen of America, of New City; of Charity Lodge, No. 100, Ancient Order of United Workmen, of Paris; of Excelsior Camp, No. 8, Modern Woodmen of America, of Mount Carroll, and of sundry citizens of Mount Vernon, all in the State of Illinois, praying that fraternal society and college journals be admitted to the mails as second-class matter; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present eight memorials, numerously signed by citizens and taxpayers of St. Louis County, Mo., remonstrating against any portion of the appropriation of $2,500,000 heretofore made by Congress for the improvement of the Missouri River for the purpose of navigation from its mouth up the river being diverted to any local improvement anywhere upon the river, and asking that such appropriation may be confined exclusively to the objects contemplated in the passage of the law. I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Appropriations for the time being, as the matter is now pending before that committee on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a memorial of the Merchants' Exchange of St. Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Hatch anti option bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Commercial Club of St. Joseph, Mo., praying for the ratification of the treaties with the Wichita, Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache tribes of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of Branch No. 108, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Newburyport, Mass., praying for the passage of House bill No. 5294, to regulate the mode of removal of letter carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Academy of Sciences, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the preservation of game in national parks; which was referred to the Select Committee on Forest Reservations.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of Branch No. 108, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Newburyport, Mass., praying for the passage of House bill No. 5294, to regulate the mode of removal of letter carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, and accede to the request of the House of Representatives for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. BRICE, and Mr. HALE were appointed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CAFFERY. I rise, Mr. President, to a question of personal privilege. In the New York Evening Post of the 14th instant there is a publication from which I will read the following excerpt:

> It would be a great public service, as well as a first-rate stroke of good politics, if all Democratic bodies and organizations in the land were to imitate the example set by the Minnesota Democratic committee, and send a public appeal to the Democratic majority in the Senate to either carry out the party's pledges and pass the tariff bill, or get out of the party. Everybody knows that when the Minnesota Democrats put the responsibility for delay upon the following Senators, they put it where it belonged:
>
> "Senators CALVIN S. BRICE of Ohio, DAVID B. HILL and EDWARD MURPHY, jr., of New York, JOHN R. MCPHERSON and JAMES SMITH, jr., of New Jersey, ARTHUR P. GORMAN and CHARLES H. GIBSON of Maryland, JOHNSON N. CAMDEN of West Virginia, DONELSON CAFFERY and EDWARD D. WHITE of Louisiana, JOHN T. MORGAN and JAMES L. PUGH of Alabama."
> These men are doing their utmost to ruin their party by hedging it in the way of the progress of the country and demonstrating its incompetency for public affairs.

Mr. President, I do not deem it necessary on every occasion to notice publications in newspapers containing false statements in regard to myself, but when a reputable newspaper like the New York Evening Post quotes approvingly the heated utterances of a Democratic club, which utterances contain misstatements in so far as I am concerned, I deem it proper as a Democrat and as a member of the Democratic Senate in my behalf to notice such misstatements.

I am not an obstructionist. I am not opposed to the speedy passage of the revenue bill named the Wilson bill, as amended by the Senate Finance Committee. I shall put no obstruction in the way of the passage of that bill. More, Mr. President, I shall actively support it and vote for it—as it now stands in the Senate—either that or a bill substantially embracing the provisions of the bill as amended by the Senate committee.

I desire to say this much in justice to myself.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WASHBURN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the St. Louis River Bridge Company and the Duluth Transfer Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge over the St. Louis River from a point at or near Grassy Point, in the village of West Duluth, Minn., to the most available point opposite, in the State of Wisconsin, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PEFFER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 487) for the relief of the widow and heirs of Samuel Kramer, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1480) to codify and arrange the laws relating to pensions, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 265) to provide for a May term of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of South Carolina, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1644) relating to the detail of retired officers of the Army at institutions of learning, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1824) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims and for the relief of Samuel Fitzhugh, administrator of Henry Fitzhugh, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 982) for the relief of Cumberland Female College, of McMinnville, Tenn., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1912) for the relief of the Bath Iron Works, of Bath, Me., reported it favorably as an amendment intended to be proposed to the naval appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

THOMAS R. PROCTOR.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 74) for the proper enrollment of Thomas R. Proctor in the Navy of the United States, to report it without amendment and submit a report thereon.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. It is one that merely confers a relative rank to enable the man to join the Loyal Legion. It gives no claim whatever for any pay, allowances, pension, bounty, or other remuneration. It is the only case of its kind in the Navy.

Mr. HALE. I will say that the committee examined the subject and the facts are as stated by the Senator from Vermont. There can be no possible reason why the joint resolution should not be passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that Thomas R. Proctor, who was secretary to the acting rear-admiral commanding the Pacific Squadron of the United States Navy on actual sea service, and who was duly appointed October 1, 1864, and actually performed sea service during the war in such capacity until honorably discharged from the Navy December 12, 1866, shall be deemed and taken to have had the relative rank of a lieutenant on the active list in the Navy of the United States, and shall be so recorded in the Register of the Navy of the United States. But such relative rank shall confer no claim whatever to any pay, allowances, pension, bounty, or other remuneration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I merely wish to ask whether the joint resolution is reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PROCTOR. It is reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been so reported, the Chair will state to the Senator from Illinois.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories to ask that certain letters addressed to that committee in reference to the boundaries of the Yellowstone National Park be printed in document form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the letters referred to will be printed as a document.

ST. LOUIS RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. WASHBURN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5978) to authorize the construction of a steel bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, to report it favorably, with amendments, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments of the committee will be stated in their order.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was, in section 3, line 1, after the words "referred to in," to strike out "lines 10 and 11 of," so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the accessory works referred to in the preceding section shall be such booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for confining the flow of water to a permanent channel, and for the guiding of steamboats, rafts, and other water craft safely through the draw and rafting spans, as shall be required by the Secretary of War, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 1, after the word "bridge," to insert "built;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That the bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a pivot drawbridge, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SUPPRESSION OF LOTTERY TRAFFIC.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1620) for the suppression of lottery traffic through national and interstate commerce and the postal service subject to the jurisdiction and laws of the United States. The bill is very brief.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him; which will be read for information.

Mr. HOAR. The original bill was introduced by me in the first instance. The Committee on the Judiciary have reported an amendment to the bill in the nature of a substitute. I suppose it is only necessary to read the substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary; but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. ALLEN. I have no desire to object to the consideration of the bill, but it is now twenty-five minutes to 1 o'clock, and the routine business of the morning has not yet been transacted.

Mr. HOAR. The bill is very brief indeed, and I hope the Senator will allow it to pass. It is very important that the setting up of lotteries in other countries and sending their drawings here should be broken up. All the people of Florida, without distinction of party, desire this legislation.

Mr. ALLEN. The entire morning hour yesterday was consumed in precisely this way.

Mr. HOAR. The bill can not take more than five minutes.

Mr. PASCO. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not urge his objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. The reading is now nearly half through.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That any person who, within the jurisdiction and subject to the laws of the United States, shall contrive, propose, set up, or draw a lottery, so-called gift concert, or similar enterprise, offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance, or assists in such contriving, proposing, setting up, or drawing in any place within the jurisdiction and subject to the laws of the United States, or who, from any place whatever, whether within or without such jurisdiction, shall cause to be sold, transferred, or delivered within any place subject to the jurisdiction and laws of the United States, or who shall cause to be brought within any place subject to the jurisdiction and laws of the United States from abroad, or deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States, or carried from one State to another in the United States, any paper, certificate, or instrument purporting to be or represent a ticket, chance, share, or interest in or dependent upon the event of such lottery, so-called gift concert, or similar enterprise, offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance, or shall cause any advertisement of such lottery, so-called gift concert, or similar enterprise, offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance, to be brought into the United States, or deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States, or transferred from one State to another in the same, shall be guilty of a felony, and be punishable in the first offense by imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or both, and in the second and after offenses by such imprisonment only.

SEC. 2. That any person violating any of the provisions of this act may be proceeded against by information or indictment and tried and punished either in the district at which the unlawful importation was made, or the unlawful deposit in the mails was made, or to which the matter deposited was carried by mail for delivery according to the directions thereon, or at which it is caused to be delivered by mail to the person to whom it is addressed, or in either of the districts through which it may have passed in the course of interstate commerce.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of sections 3929 and 4041 of the United States Revised Statutes as amended, respectively, and the provisions of sections 2491 and 2492 of the United States Revised Statutes, and of sections 11, 12, and 13 of the act of Congress of October 1, 1890, entitled "Chapter 1244. An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes," and all other provisions of law for the suppression of traffic in or circulation of any such tickets, chances, shares, or interests in or other matter relating to lotteries, or for the suppression of traffic in or circulation of obscene books or articles of any kind, shall apply in support, aid, and furtherance of the enforcement of this act.

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to repeal by implication sections 3894, 3929, or 4041 of the United States Revised Statutes, or any part thereof, nor any provisions of the act of Congress of April 24, 1878, entitled "An act to prevent the sale of policy or lottery tickets in the District of Columbia," nor any provisions of the act of Congress of September 19, 1890, entitled "An act to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes relating to lotteries, and for other purposes," nor any provision of the laws whatsoever against the establishment of lotteries, or games, or other schemes, or prizes, or chances, or the traffic in or circulation of tickets and other such papers or instruments, or the publication of advertisements or notices in any wise relating thereto.

SEC. 5. That the powers conferred upon the Postmaster-General by the statute of 1890, chapter 908, section 2, are hereby extended and made applicable to all letters or other matter sent by mail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which has just been read for information. Is there objection?

Mr. VEST. I do not know but that I shall support the bill. However, I should like to have time to look at it. There are some singular provisions in it, it seems to me, and there are some very nice questions in regard to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government as I read the bill now. I have just seen it for the first time, and I should like to have it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri, if he can do so, to examine the measure as it is reported by the committee, as it is very important that it should pass at an early day. It is very simple. I should like to call it up to-morrow in the morning hour.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that. I do not wish to delay the bill at all.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. I shall endeavor to call it up to-morrow morning.

DISTRICT POLICE FORCE.

Mr. HARRIS. Yesterday the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MARTIN] presented a paper in the form of a petition from Maj. Moore, the chief of police of the District of Columbia, in respect to certain appropriations necessary to that force. It was by mistake referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee has already reported an amendment, as asked for by the chief of police, and it has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on the District of Columbia should be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, and it should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

COMMANDER F. W. DICKINS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of two bills of courtesy, I may call them, one of which has come unanimously from the House of Representatives, and both unanimously from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, permitting certain gentlemen to accept foreign decorations. I ask first for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5276) to authorize Commander F. W. Dickens, of the United States Navy, to accept the decoration of the cross of naval merit of the third class from the King of Spain.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROF. ASAPH HALL.

Mr. HAWLEY. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a similar bill, the bill (S. 1860) to authorize Prof. Asaph Hall, of the United States Navy, to accept a gold medal from the Academy of Sciences of France.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not intend to object to the consideration of the bill, but the practice of asking consent to consider every bill when reported consumes the whole morning hour, and we do not get beyond the reports of committees.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I am not going to object to the Senator's bill, but I give notice that I shall object to the next one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to be heard for a moment to correct a misapprehension. These bills have been reported for some time, and have been on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. I was not aware of that fact.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. What is the order of procee ling?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committee

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. PEFFER. If there is no further morning business, I ask for the consideration of the resolution submitted by me, coming over from a previous day.

Mr. MANDERSON. There is further morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is not yet completed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to introduce a bill, if that order has been reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further reports of committees, the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is the next business in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, greatly encouraged by the action of the Senate yesterday with reference to creating an additional judicial district in the State of Texas, and after consultation with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], finding that the States of Minnesota and Nebraska are alike in great need of additional judicial aid, we have prepared a bill providing for an additional district judge in each, which will make two United States judges in each of the States of Minnesota and Nebraska, something that has been very greatly desired for many years. I now introduce the bill, and hope the Committee on the Judiciary will take immediate action with reference to it, and do the favor and the justice to the States by reporting it speedily for passage.

The bill (S. 1920) providing for an additional district judge in each of the districts of Minnesota and Nebraska was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRIS. At the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, I introduce a bill which, with accompanying letter from the Commissioners, I ask be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. 1921) for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks, crosswalks, and gutters in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. POWER introduced a bill (S. 1922) to extend the time for making final payments on entries under the preemption act; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 1923) for an act to repeal section 3412 and 3413 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. POWER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. VOORHEES, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of Calvin Jones for damages against the Government on account of the destruction of property by United States troops be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

BINDING OF TARIFF COMPILATION.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Ordered, That there be bound, under the direction of the Committee on Finance, for the use of the Senate in debate, 200 copies of the Report 334, being a comparison in quarto form, with reference margin of H. R. 4864 and existing law.

CLERKS IN TREASURY AND INTERIOR DEPARTMENTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. GALLINGER on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate in separate lists the names of all clerks and employés appointed, promoted, reduced, and dismissed since the 4th day of March, 1893, and the State to which each such clerk or employé is accredited; also that such of them as served in the Army or Navy of the United States at any time during the war of the rebellion shall be designated by some distinguishing mark in each list.

Mr. GALLINGER. The morning hour is so nearly closed that I ask unanimous consent that the resolution go over, retaining its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the resolution go over without losing its place and be laid before the Senate to-morrow morning. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HEARINGS ON PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1808) to amend the act of June 22, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at the city of Yankton, S. Dak." It is a short bill of only one page and refers to the extension of time for building the bridge.

Mr. PEFFER. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas objects to the present consideration of the bill. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], which comes over under the rule.

The SECRETARY. A resolution providing for a select committee to be known as the Committee on Communication.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that the resolution be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the resolution by substituting the Finance Committee for the select committee provided for in the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the resolution, which will be stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the resolution read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that it be read before the question is taken on the motion to refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER on the 14th instant, as follows:

Whereas there exists in many places and on the part of large numbers of citizens, individually and in organized bodies, a disposition to visit the city of Washington for the purpose of personally presenting to Congress their views with respect to pending and prospective measures of legislation; and

Whereas many of such persons and bodies are reported to be now on their way hither, with others likely to follow, for the purposes aforesaid:

Therefore, to the end that these our petitioners shall have full and respectful hearing and that proceedings attending their communication with the Senate shall be orderly and not subjected to interruption by the transaction of other public business,

Be it resolved, That a select committee of nine members of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President, to be known as the Committee on Communication, whose duty it shall be to receive all written or printed communications from citizens or bodies of citizens visiting the Capitol, or intending to make such visit, for the purposes mentioned in the preamble hereto, and to receive all petitions, memorials, and remonstrances of such persons and bodies and hear them orally in relation to the matters and things about which they desire to communicate with the Senate. The committee shall report fully to the Senate from time to time as other committees report.

The Sergeant-at-Arms will set aside a convenient room in the Capitol or other building belonging to the Government for the use of said committee, and furnish the same with the necessary articles for the convenient dispatch of business.

Mr. PEFFER. There is a slight mistake in the printing of the resolution. The last "whereas" in the official print ought to be substituted by the word "therefore."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the modification will be made.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SHERMAN. The rules require, as the resolution proposes the organization of a new committee, that it shall be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. PEFFER. The resolution proposes to create a select committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the rule requires that the resolution shall be referred to the Committee on Rules, because it proposes a change of the rules.

Mr. HARRIS. We on this side of the Chamber can not hear the Senator from Ohio. I wish he would speak a little louder.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the rule requires, as the resolution proposes the organization of a new committee, that it should go to the Committee on Rules. It is a change of the rules; it proposes addition to the number of committees. Therefore I hope that course will be taken rather than any other.

Mr. HOAR. Let the rule be read that requires the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not informed of the rule the Senator from Ohio relies upon.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the rule to which the Senator from Ohio refers?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think any addition to the number of committees is a change in the rules. The organization of a committee is a change of the rules.

Mr. COCKRELL. Clearly so, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. Therefore the resolution should go to the Committee on Rules by the general rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the resolution proposes the creation of a select committee, and that question is not affected by any rule of which the Chair is aware.

Mr. HARRIS. The rule refers to standing committees. That is certainly true, according to my recollection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. PEFFER. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. HARRIS. The hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, according to the timepiece in the Chamber.

Mr. PEFFER. Then let the resolution retain its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, under the consent agreement of the Senate the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print 6,000 copies of the fourth edition of the document entitled "Coinage Laws of the United States, 1792 to 1894," prepared under the direction of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution to print 11,000 copies of a special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department on the imports for consumption and the domestic exports for the years 1884 to 1894; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution to print the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the life and services of Hon. William H. Enochs, late a Representative from the State of Ohio; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution to print and bind in cloth 1,500 copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. With the consent of the Senate, on Friday, the 20th instant, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall submit some observations on the pending bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President——

Mr. PALMER. I beg leave to interrupt the Senator from Vermont for a moment. I desire at an early day to submit some remarks to the Senate on the pending bill. I observe that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] has given notice of his purpose to address the Senate on the same subject next Monday. I wish to inquire whether a notice of my purpose to address the Senate on Tuesday would violate any understanding between the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. If it does not, I give notice that on Tuesday I shall address the Senate on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, no matter how far-reaching the importance of the subject under discussion may be, I know how vain it would be for me, at 1 o'clock in the day, to seek to deprive the cigar symposium of its usual quorum in the coat room, and I shall only hope, by comparative Senatorial brevity, not to weary the unoccupied mahogany chairs of Senators with merely "wise saws and modern instances."

The financial and industrial crisis has not yet passed away, and it is a wondrous pity that the political interests of the Democratic party should require its continuance by a vainglorious and clumsy attempt to practically carry out its Chicago tariff platform. Surely the poltical tariff bill now presented, instead of a revenue tariff, will give more comfort abroad than at home, even to its tired authors, and the rather distended notion of the people in 1892 of Democratic statesmanship and infallibility in the construction of a symmetrical "tariff for revenue only" has suddenly collapsed. Even their Mugwump allies openly jeer and sneer at their work. Their bill was barely launched before the very able Senator from New York, a skillful and courageous navigator on stormy seas, declined to sink or swim on the unseaworthy craft. Surely the crew should now feel warned to jump ashore and refuse to go down with the keel-broken bill.

The Democracy has the élite habit of shaking hands with free trade with its elbow on a level with the top of the head, but droops limp and low when 85 per cent protection is demanded and yielded on rice. It embraces "revenue reform" like a lover, and presto sees "revenue only" in a 55 per cent protection on cuffs and collars. Free trade swears eternal fealty to the Democratic goddess of "free raw materials," but forthwith the goddess is dethroned by the Democratic provisional government on the tariff, and protection on coal, coke, and iron ore, graciously reinstated, is no longer a "culminating atrocity." The ferocity of free trade against a ten-million bounty on sugar could not be muzzled, but a tax of forty-one millions for the protection of sugar cane, a veritable white elephant, is welcomed with a smile, slightly puckered. The philosophy of the present tariff bill, as confessed by the chairman, that concessions had to be made to pass the bill, is found in the dogma that "all government and every prudent act is founded on compromise and barter," by which it will be explained how one by one of the foregoing capricious favors crawled hurriedly into the tariff bill when some Democratic Roman threatened otherwise to appeal unto Cæsar. If any Republican begged for favors they were piously pitied and then piteously crucified.

Concerning the rates of duties reported in the tariff bill, it is no violation of the confidential relations of the Senate Committee on Finance to state now that they were all fixed and determined without the votes of the Republican members, and against even the votes of any hesitating or divergent minority of the Democratic members. Thus many of the most important questions may have been determined by the small fraction of three or four of a committee of eleven, but, while the process of evolution was a great novelty, it will not be controverted that all the rates of duty are of the purest Democratic origin. Tariffs "for revenue only" prove to be only political tariffs, valid only until after the next election.

The honorable chairman of the Finance Committee, however, in his opening speech, declared with real sadness that some parts of the tariff bill he presented were consented to under "duress." Legally and constitutionally, therefore, this was such bald coercion as to invalidate the whole bill, and the committee are entitled to relief from the fraud, which should be promptly granted by the Senate. That is, the bill must be wholly ignored or unanimously rejected. I know of nothing less that will redress the ignominious "duress" imposed upon the committee.

The items inserted under "duress" should never go to a committee of conference between the two Houses of Congress to embarrass the Senate conferrees, although their action might not be unlike that of the boy's cousins, where he went for an afternoon visit. Coming home very hungry, and being asked by his mother if he wasn't invited to supper with them, he answered, "Yes, but they weren't no hands to urge, I tell ye." Our conferrees will certainly be "No hands to urge," and the "duress" amendments may be doomed to a short shrift.

But I have other reasons why this bill should be rejected. The bill was reported March 20, 1894, to the Senate, with voluminous and extraordinary amendments. Twenty days thereafter the same committee presented a litter of forty more amendments. There is little doubt but that a much larger number will yet be a prime necessity, if the committee will only labor and wait. Their chief objection to long waiting, perhaps, would be that the committee might not find the House of Representatives then constituted with a Democratic majority any more in favor of a killing double dose of tariff reform than of protection under "duress" in spots.

Among the glories of the historic career of Americans none have been of greater splendor than those displayed by manufacturers and inventors. Their achievements have excited both the wonder and the envy of the Old World, but our much esteemed chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. VOORHEES], unwilling to aggravate our national self-esteem, did not seek in his opening tariff speech to praise, but sought to bury these American manufacturers by a calm, deliberate, and judicial pronunciamento, charging them and protective tariffs with such infamy and crimes alternately as "plunder and spoliation," or "spoliation and plunder," "robbery," and "unbridled extortion;" as "colossal taskmasters," and that there have been "millions of blackmail levied by American manufacturers;" again as "sinister, perfidious, and dishonest," as a "giant robber, a predatory monster obstructing the highways of legislation and challenging legislators themselves to stand and deliver," and at last as a pickpocket "thief."

I can not say anything amiss of my greatly esteemed friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who we all know to be, like my Uncle Toby, "the very quintessence of the milk of human kindness," and I regret that he seems to have made an effort himself to create a different impression by his rather free commentary upon the same financial policy of that established in the first year of Washington's administration for the "protection and encouragement of manufactures," with its "infamy" enduring and prospering for a hundred years unsuspected, and now, I hope reluctantly, disclosed, though awfully denounced. If, however, the long-bow and revolutionary pronunciamento against invisible "millionaire manufacturers" should be thought by his more advanced colleagues as lacking in adequate furor and reverberation let it be noted that it was not the fault of the distinguished chairman, but of the epithetical insufficiency of the English vocabulary to meet the gravity of the case, and it will be conceded that it might have been more appropriate to have borrowed the sonorous and deeper-toned language by which the bull against the comet was promulgated. After all, the jurors of the country, so far as recently heard from, do not seem in a mood to consign all American manufacturers as criminals, robbers, and monsters to the penitentiary, nor even to permit any reasonably protective tariff to long remain in a Democratic purgatory.

The increase of our manufacturing products from $5,000,000,000 in 1880 to $9,000,000,000 in 1890 eclipses any progressive growth of this or any other country in all the world's history, supplemented by the further facts that both the amount of capital and the number of employés were more than doubled, and while the average of wages paid increased 39 per cent, the average prices of manufactures diminished 20 per centum. In 1890, under a Republican régime, the four and one-half millions of employés, with many more millions of their dependents, were happy, and over six thousand millions of capital appeared safe and prosperous. In 1894 the half-born Democratic tariff bill, now in the Senate, like Milton's

> Tawny lion, pawing to get free
> His hinder parts,

threatens to maim and cripple the whole of our vastly extended manufactures, and much of them to absolutely destroy, by an intentional and vicious surrender to foreigners of the American market. This impending hostility has for many months been multiplying a great army of the unemployed. Steam engines have had a rest. Dividends have been cut in twain or have wholly ceased. Bankruptcies only seem to flourish. And now, as if to flatten out all hope for the future, not only are the rates of duties to be stubbornly docked, but the specific is to be recklessly superseded by the exploded ad valorem system, under which duties largely depend upon the integrity, or the frequent want of integrity, in the foreign valuation set forth in the invoice.

The proposed general abandonment of specific tariff duties for the obsolete ad valorem system in defiance of the judgment of the foremost statesmen throughout the world, including nearly all our own Secretaries of the Treasury, indicates the decadence somewhere of enlightened statesmanship, and of all the lessons of ripe experience in handling great national revenue measures. The Walker experiment of nearly fifty years ago, lubricated by the marvelous California output of gold, also by our lavish expenditures in the Mexican war, and by a foreign famine, creating a temporary demand for everything we had to sell, had its objectionable character glossed over by unrelated prosperity only for a brief time, but ended in all respects as a deplorable failure.

Ad valorem tariff duties are scornfully shunned by English free-traders as well as by European continental protectionists. They do not secure a stable revenue. They require a very large increase of custom-house forces. They plunge the Government into multitudinous and expensive litigation with many importers. They open a market to every description of goods of the lowest and poorest character, rather than of the best, and offer the widest opportunities for fraud and universal undervaluation to those who do not regard cheating custom-house officers as malum in se.

The tariff portion of this bill makes its destructive purpose prominent by an assault upon each and every production of the farmer. It cuts the jugular of sheep husbandry by consigning wool to the free list and to the tender mercy of free trade. American wool-growing in competition with the cheap labor and cheap pasturage of Australia, Africa, and South America must perish. Even the long-wool sheep for mutton are likely to be mainly supplied by Canada. With the removal of 10 cents duty per pound on clothing wools the flocks upon our thousand hills will disappear. The good shepherds who have invested more than five hundred millions of capital to uphold this industry and to gain a modest support will find themselves caught in a tariff thicket to be offered up as a sacrifice to a Democratic theory only.

The fact that wool, under protection from 1892 to 1893, there was an increase in one year of 31,000,000 pounds, conclusively proves that it is entitled to continued favor. The further fact that from a well-grounded fear of the hostile legislation now impending here, the decline in the total value of sheep from January 1, 1893, to January 1, 1894, was from $125,909,264 to $89,186,110, or showing a shrinkage, according to the Department of Agriculture, of $37,000,000 is only a foretaste of the final fate of wool, even in the country where the annual product now stands the third largest of the world. The large demand for foreign wool to supply the home deficiency will create peremptory demands for gold to balance the adverse foreign account.

Wool is not only about to be slaughtered, but it seems foreordained by the Sangrado Democratic leaders that no interest or product of the farmer shall escape being bled by the bill reported. Grain of all kinds, cattle, horses, sheep, hogs, lard, butter, cheese, milk, flax, hemp, hay, straw, eggs, and poultry, are all to have something of their prosperity withdrawn, either by the total loss of protection or by a radical reduction of tariff duties. This serves to show that revenue reformers love our Canadian neighbors much better than ourselves. No wonder that the hilarious Tory leader there should tell his people that the Wilson bill "gives Canada all she wants without surrendering anything."

I do not forget, while wool is to be free, that mungo and shoddy are to have the protection of a 15 per cent duty. This may exclude the mungo and shoddy, but it will not exclude the low-grade shoddy woolen cloths, which are to be subject only to an ad valorem duty, without the specific duty on weight which has heretofore successfully served to shut them out. The Wilson bill, therefore, will be likely to furnish the dumping ground for a large share of the most worthless shoddy goods of Europe.

But, as if it were not enough to cripple the home market of the farmer, this blind-eyed tariff bill proposes to abrogate all reciprocity arrangements by which farmers and others secured for their products a broader and valuable market abroad. The sudden and splenetic abrogation of all these arrangements with foreign nations cannot fail to shock their good will and seriously affront our own people.

Free traders perversely claim that all duties paid on imported manufactures are always paid by the consumers. They forget how greatly the enormous competition of nine thousand millions of American products in our own and other markets must have reduced the prices of manufactures throughout the world; and the claim is also refuted by our own experience, which shows that every article that has received any stable tariff protection has been permanently and largely reduced in price to consumers. This can be proven by citing examples of wholesale prices very indiscriminately, as follows:

Two-plyg inrain carpets in 1871, $1 per yard; 50 cents in 1891. Wilton carpets in 1876, $3 per yard; $2.10 in 1891. Turks Island salt in 1871, 45 cents per bushel; 26 cents in 1891. Solar salt in 1871, $2 per barrel of 280 pounds; 74 cents in 1891. Cut nails in 1860, 6 cents per pound; in 1892, 1¼ cents. Calico, Cocheco prints, in 1860, 10 cents per yard; 1891, 6 cents per yard. Sheetings, 4 x 4, Lawrence; in 1871, 9½ cents per yard; in 1891, 5½ cents. Sugar, fair refining, 9½ cents in 1871, and 2⅜ cents in 1891. Most of these latest prices are still lower to-day.

The great wrongs, obliquities, and incongruities pervading the bill will have attention when the details are reached for consideration. That the radical changes proposed, if made, will reduce many people, hitherto prosperous, to poverty, can hardly be disputed by sane people. The abounding invitations offered by the bill to the imports of foreign merchandise must paralyze many important American investments. They will, however, give active employment to laborers abroad, and to an equal extent diminish that of American laborers. The number of the unemployed is likely to be multipled, and those who can be employed will learn that the first step toward free trade is a step down in wages. They will also learn who are to be held responsible for the disastrous results by the final vote recorded upon the bill in the Senate.

The appearance here in the United States Congress at a time of profound peace of a wide-straddling income-tax bill, unheralded by the platform of either of the great parties of the country, and only commended by the unsavory example of the Old World oligarchies in distress, must be reckoned as a blunder of unusual magnitude even for a Democratic administration. Certainly we have not the excuse of the overtaxed European nations, sorely burdened by enormous imperial armies and royal navies, nor the lame justification that our system of raising revenue, with all the past experience in its favor, was inadequate and must be superseded to obtain more revenue by the rigors to which the subjects of Germany, England, Austria, and Italy have been, not uncomplainingly, compelled to submit. The charge of an excess of revenue, lately iterated against protection is already abandoned by the party whose dominance it is expected will cease March 4, 1895, but which is now on a wild income hunt for revenue to fill the vacuum to be created by a Democratic tariff.

If more revenue, instead of less, had been desired, and not the creation of a deficit, solely to make room for an unequal income tax, more would have been easily obtainable from a light duty on some of the articles in the long list now free, or by an increase of the tax on malt liquors, and that without the addition of a dime to the cost of collection.

It is to be hoped that the income scheme has not been inspired by a willingness on the part of its projectors akin to that of Artemus Ward, who announced his willingness that all of his wife's relations should enlist or be drafted in our late war, and yet it looks very like a thrifty local and sectional scheme to willingly grant to others, rather than to its tropical projectors, the honors accruing to all contributions made to an income tax.

I trust those who think, by shutting their eyes that they can swallow the income proposition at a single gulp without danger to their digestion, or to that of their constituents, will listen while I very briefly present what appear to me as some of the objections to the measure and which, I fear, will bear heavily upon many humble and plain people.

Any income tax, like the one here proposed, which fixes the tax at one rate in its application to all persons, is manifestly unjust. That derived from rent of houses, always needing annual repairs, should be less than that on land; that derived from labor, less than that upon real property; that from silver mines less than that from more stable coal mines; and that from professional men, wholly dependent on their health, less than that upon brewers and distillers. To make things equal, some discrimination must be made.

Pitt introduced the British income tax during the Napoleonic war. After the peace it was repealed on the ground that it ought to be exclusively reserved for times of war; and when reimposed in 1842 it was promised that it should be only temporary. Sir John Lubbock, in the North American Review, recently quoted Mr. Gladstone as having stated, though the tax was "an engine of gigantic power for great national purposes," there were "circumstances attending its operation which make it difficult, perhaps impossible, or at any rate not desirable, to maintain it as a portion of the permanent and ordinary finance."

The poor excuse for an income tax now is that a precedent has been found for it in that first enforced here in 1863, the prodigal extremes of which were copied then, as now, from the British statutes, but then only tolerated by us in consequence of the extraordinary exigencies of a great civil war. The measure now resurrected, with its grave clothes still adhering to it, is to be imposed upon our people as a redemption of the latest Democratic national pledge to diminish taxation. Yet the party which thus promised reform and was pledged to remove war taxes by "a tariff for revenue only" now proposes to revive the most obnoxious of all the war taxes, and still expects to be trusted for its political honesty. We can hardly fail to be reminded of the reply made to Gil Blas when he told the horse dealer that "He would trust to his honesty," and was answered back by the horse dealer, "When you appeal to my honesty you touch my weak point." Were we to appeal to the honesty of fanatical tariff reformers, it is to be feared we might touch their weak point.

Thirty years ago our country was afflicted by all the miseries of the greatest of civil wars, and there can be none worse. The rebellion had its supporters in the largest half of the territory of the United States, with some aid and comfort elsewhere from those who were willing to "let the wayward sisters go in peace," and the full sympathy of the Whig and Tory party leaders in Great Britain, as well as a French fellow conspirator in Louis Napoleon. Millions of men had been summoned to the bloody conflict, already punctuated by many battles, and involving a daily expenditure of millions of dollars which it was then impossible to borrow. In this grim crisis the patriotic North, eager for victory and impatient of delay, cried out, "On to Richmond!" and louder yet to Congress, "If more money is wanted, put on the taxes!" Thus it was, with cannon resounding within earshot of the Capitol, that the war income tax had its melancholy birth, and what was then the extreme medicine required amidst a most formidable rebellion is now to be offered, during profoundest peace, as our perpetual and regular diet. Can it be that our Southern brethren are ready, instead of repealing war taxes, to make the remembrance of the late war immortal by perpetuating one of its notable grievances?

In 1862 the income tax was reported in a general revenue bill by the Committee on Ways and Means, yet with reluctance, and it was then admitted by the committee to be less defensible than any other portion of the bill, but being for the maintenance of the Union it was supported by a rousing loyal majority, although fourteen negative votes were recorded, and among them the names of such distinguished Democrats as Mr. Vallandigham, Mr. VOORHEES, and Mr. Pendleton.

The income tax now proposed in the Democratic tariff bill includes the dividends of banks, insurance, railroad, manufacturing, and gas companies, together with all business institutions, whether incorporated or not, which issue stock upon which interest or dividends shall be paid or accrue, whether paid or not. No owner of stock, little or much, in these institutions is to escape an extra tax thereon. The men, women, and children, who by rubbing and scrubbing industry have become the owners of any shares in corporations by which a possible semiannual dividend has been earned, will feel, when that dividend has been cut and clipped by a national income tax, that they have been subjected to heartless and indefensible injustice. Even the farmers, who in their towns have clubbed together to establish town creameries, will find their dividends are to be taxed.

Our country is dotted all over with institutions essential to the general welfare, where the capital is not mainly made up by the rich, but largely contributed by those in moderate or humble circumstances, to aid local prosperity, and who are anxious to have some little savings treasured up to meet old age and all the vicissitudes of human life. But this Democratic income tax boldly grabs each one of these helpless parties and snatches its grim and paltry tribute. If a poor widow, whose husband has left her an income of $500 in the stock of some bank, should be absurdly told by an income crank that this is a tax upon the corporation and no tax upon her, will she believe it? No; but she might warn him to beware of the fate of that ancient liar, Ananias.

The stockholders of the great Pennsylvania Railroad number 27,665, and yet 26,684 of this number receive in 5 per cent annual dividends less than $1,000 each from the company; but all will be subject to the income tax. The number of stockholders in the Lehigh Valley Company is 9,021. Only 22 of these receive in their customary 5 per cent dividends so much as $4,000, and among those with limited holdings there are 4,500 women, or more than half of the whole company. These are examples that might be multiplied by the facts in most other corporations of the victims selected by this grossly unequal income tax.

The bald assumption, therefore, that the income tail to the tariff bill would impose a tax merely upon large accumulations of wealth, or upon no one having less than $4,000, is a rickety pretense, or rather a robust fraud. Instead of only touching persons with the income of $4,000 or over it would beyond all question smite a greater multitude having less than even $1,000. The House Ways and Means report elaborately declared that.

> The committee see no hardship in requiring those who have incomes of more than $4,000 per year to pay 2 per cent of all in excess of that amount to carry on the Government under which it has been accumulated and by which it is protected.

The committee thus clearly and adroitly conveyed the idea that they were about to tax only the "incomes of more than $4,000 a year," and to cover all others with their paternal exemption from an income tax. When the ostrich hides its head in the sand, its other end swings higher up, and the fact can not be hidden that this committee saw no hardship in requiring a far more numerous class who have incomes of less than $4,000 to pay on every dollar of it, if its source was from a corporation.

When those having an income in excess of $4,000 a year, including Senators, Representatives, and others receiving salaries from the Government, came to be paternally considered and protected by the lonely architects of the income appendix to the Democratic tariff bill, they carefully provided for the deduction and exception from returns of income in excess of $4,000, or "the amount of income received from institutions or corporations whose officers, as required by law, withhold a per centum of the dividends, interest, gain, profits, and income made by such institutions," * * "and except that portion of the salary or pay received for services in the civil, military, naval, or other service of the United States, including Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, from which the tax has been deducted."

Those with large incomes are thus to be scrupulously shielded from injustice, while those of less wealth or less dignity, if they have been so stupid or so ignorant of Democratic finance and malice as to invest their small fortunes in any bank or other corporation, will have to pay to the uttermost farthing without any deductions. No incomes of anybody from such wicked sources, except the $4,000 men, are to have Democratic charity or forgiveness. The small fish are to be caught in an income net from which the big fish can leap out. The widow's mite as well as the sole income of the orphan is to be diminished by the Government of 66,000,000 people heretofore claimed to be the most prosperous of the world.

Can a Democratic Congress feel proud which makes such conspicuous discrimination in favor of wealth and official position, and which is wont to enter a tariff closet and shut the door to pray? "God, I thank thee, that I am not as the rest of men, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. I give tithes of all that I get." Can such a Congress be proud of this ill-born income bantling, never wont to be owned or caressed here except in the face of grim-visaged war, as their crowning grace and consummation of a promised but miscarried "tariff for revenue only"?

Even those in the grammar of political economy will hardly deny that the removal of the tariff from foreign manufactures must to the whole extent of an income substitute tax put the burden entirely upon Americans.

The income tax bill, by its proposed seizure of many important objects of taxation upon which the several State governments have hitherto been largely dependent for a considerable part, in some States for the whole of their annual support, will prove a serious invasion of the sources upon which they now largely base their taxation. Nearly every State imposes a tax upon the real estate and personal property of its citizens, especially upon their stock in railroads and banks, mills and factories, and their coal, iron, copper, gold, and silver mines, their stone, slate, and marble companies, their debts and bonds due and collectible. All these sources and all corporations which yield dividends or interest are now to be squeezed and stripped first by the National Government, and then be subjected to a second stripping by the States. This double taxation is a wholly unnecessary and uncalled-for intrusion of the United States into the domains long exclusively occupied by the several States, and they will not welcome with alacrity a joint occupancy, though it be with a great and superior power. It is the old case of Ahab, moved by Jezebel, of coveting Naboth's vineyard, when Ahab held a far more ample and legitimate field about to be abandoned to free trade.

This ill-timed income tax is even to hold gifts of personal property as legitimate objects of its tyranny. The tokens of regard bestowed upon parties celebrating their golden wedding must all be accounted for and their value sworn to before a notary public as component parts of their annual accretions. Or, if an aged man, confident that the filial affection of his son would care for his future wants, should think it better to be relieved from growing burdens, and should therefore transfer to his son as a gift his personal property, even such a gift must pay toll to the General Government.

Personally my income tax under this bill, with its partial exemptions, would be so light that I should be ashamed to grumble about the tax. At my time of life it can not hurt me much nor very long, and above all others the members of Congress imposing this tax should not escape from it. Nor does the very small number in the State I have the honor in part to represent, who may be taxed on incomes of $4,000 or more, excite my solicitude. But the great wrong to which I would call attention is that of the numerous small stockholders of every business corporation that ever earns a dividend are to be subjected to an income tax, however inconsiderable and fragmentary may be the amount of their whole personal income or means of support.

A not less serious objection is that, like the tariff part of the bill proposed, it is local and sectional in its application and throws the onus principally upon the Northern States. This will be obvious to those who examine the record of the income tax from 1863 to 1873, which shows that during these ten years while the total tax collected was $347,220,897.20, only $11,004,389.20 were collected from the eleven States once known as the Confederate States. The State of New York paid in one year $21,340,000.19, or just about twice as much. Of course the North was not ignorant of what the result would be then, nor is the South ignorant of what the result would be now. The latter feel no doubt that the best place for an income tax is that long ago pointed out for a boil, on some other fellow.

We are all proud of having more railroads in number and extent than any other country, and, after getting them, there is no other country where they are treated more shabbily. They are fixtures and must so remain, although many are obstructed by hostile legislation, from earning anything beyond their running expenses. The United States Government should not participate with the States in processes of confiscating the large investments already made or yet to be made, which promote commerce, cheapen the transportation of travelers, freight, and mails, and aid the general prosperity of States, towns, and cities. The income-tax bill will first levy 2 per cent on all dividends of railroads, and second will levy the same amount of tax upon their indebtedness, that is, upon the interest due and to be paid on their mortgage bonds. For example, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, with a capital of $30,000,000, recently paying no dividends and which now pays but a limited one, and owes on a long series of mortgage bonds upward of $80,000,000 with interest varying from 4 to 7 per cent.* The income derived from the capital is now not only to be assessed, but the interest paid out on all its indebtedness, amounting to almost three times that of its capital. The bonds bearing the lowest rate of interest will be clipped as well as those bearing the highest. The railroad company does not repudiate its contract, but the General Government as the sovereign guardian of the public honor, is not to hesitate to receipt for its 2 per cent with all the moral obliquity included.

If this company, or any other owing mortgage bonds, should desire, or be compelled, to obtain a new loan or to renew an old one, it must confront the fact that its indebtedness, as well as gains and profits, are to be taxed by the United States, and the terms for such loans will be more onerous and difficult to negotiate. In times of business depression railroads have little power to curtail expenses, while their receipts daily vanish. Anyone who will consult Poor's Railroad Annual will find that the number of railroads doing an immense business with very small net profits, and with bonds amounting to millions outstanding, is exceedingly numerous. Under free trade and income taxes on both dividends and debts payable, existing railroads are likely to find their embarrassments multiplied, but not by any further decades of improvident and magnificent extensions.

The policy of some rugged partisans is to hold as their enemies all corporations, however beneficent, as the cannibal Feejee Islanders once held Christian people, and though these fanatical partisans may love and forgive them, they really love them best roasted.

The Democratic party cry for years has been against all internal-revenue taxes except possibly those on malt and spirituous liquors. The revolution now proposed is to give the lead to these taxes, hitherto anathematized, and so minimize customs revenue that even incidental protection shall be impossible.

Should this bill, aided by the concurrent action of the Senate, ever reach the dignity of a law enacted by Congress, I should profoundly regret it on account of the dire calamities with which its tariff chapters are pregnant. Throughout the world it would also be regretted by the friends of free popular government that the great Republic of the United States, though everywhere at peace, should forfeit its ancient reputation of a treasury properly supported and seldom empty, and suddenly earn the poor fame of being unequal to the legislative task of proposing a revenue measure for the ordinary support of the Government without a frantic and desperate resort to an income tax—the resort only of nations which are always wrestling with financial deficits. Surely we can not afford to decorate the annals of our Republic with a vile copy of this foreign excrescence.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to announce that on Tuesday next, at 1 o'clock, I shall submit to the Senate some remarks on the pending bill.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, we may recur to a past quite recent, that day in November, when we thrust from his place a Republican Chief Magistrate, then in office—when we chose a Democratic President by the largest majority both of the States and the people recorded in modern times. This unparalleled unanimity of the popular vote and voice had a real significance.

The people do not range themselves in overwhelming numbers on one side without reason or without design. Whatever else that design may have been, it was not to support or to retain the policy of the defeated minority. That had been ruthlessly condemned and set aside. Even Ohio, the ancient fortress of the opposition limped very lamely into line and the ballot opinion of Massachusetts melted or moldered into some dim semblance of the form of political truth and rectitude.

The effect of this signal defeat of the party of so-called protection is not at all changed by the circumstance that a very few of the minority States in elections held upon national issues have since voted in the same way as they did before. It is an old, stale artifice to count the minority twice, once before and again after the polls are closed.

The party beaten in the late Presidential contest had something for which they fought and struggled, something which they put to hazard in that contest and lost. Is it not a singular position that those who won should lose and that the losers should win in anywise that which they had staked and lost?

Our first tariff law bears date July 4, 1789. The First Congress had only been in session about two months. Mr. Madison was a member of the House of Representatives, the principal advocate of the measure, and was a member of the committee which framed it. The following is the preamble of the act:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government and to discharge the debts of the United States and for the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandises imported.

It will be seen that the support of the Government and the discharge of its debts are first mentioned; the encouragement and protection of manufactures are subsidiary and secondary objects of the act. If anything were needed to show the true relations which these two sub ects occupied toward each other in the bill, it will be found in the terms and text of the enactment. The highest duty imposed upon any importation is 15 per cent—it is that placed upon imported coaches, chariots, chaises, and carriages. This tax would be necessarily paid only by the well-to-do. It is a special tax on wealth. It was not objected to as socialistic, as un-American, or as class legislation. The duties levied by this old law are nearly equally divided as to specific and ad valorem. There is not a line or rate of prohibition in the entire act. The whole levy is made for revenue.

Mr. Madison had addressed the House on the 9th of April upon the subject of the pending bill, using, among other remarks, the following language:

> In the first place, I own myself the friend of a very free system of commerce, and hold it as a truth that commercial shackles are generally unjust, oppressive, and impolitic. It is also a truth that if industry and labor are left to take their own course they will generally be directed to those objects which are most productive, and this in a more certain and direct manner than the wisdom of the most enlightened legislature could point out. Nor do I think that the national interest is more promoted by such restrictions than that the interest of individuals would be promoted by legislative interference directing the particular application of their industry. * * * The same argument holds good between nation and nation and between parts of the same nation.

Thus far Mr. Madison. Washington, who as President signed and approved this bill, and the members of Congress who passed it were contemporaries of the Constitution. They were charter members of the Grand Lodge of Liberty wherein we dwell. They certainly understood the tenor and purpose of the charter. They framed its policies, not only for their own age, but for all time. The fathers did not even conceive the notion of levying tariff duties—not to be collected—of levying duties so high as to prevent collection. They rejected the policy of exclusion. They chose and preferred that which Mr. Madison described as "a very free system of commerce" subject only to restrictions needed for purposes of revenue.

Were these men the friends and patrons of British policy? Were they the enemies of American labor and of American wage-earners? They were never accounted such. Were they accounted enemies of our manufactures? Never at any time in the history of the Government. They provided for their encouragement and protection, but that encouragement was only such as is necessarily afforded by the imposition of duty rates upon foreign merchandise. They tolerated and allowed all imports. They throttled at the very start all monopolies.

And there is another portion of this early speech upon the tariff worthy of our special notice. In speaking of the business of the country Mr. Madison said:

> In my opinion it would be proper also to consider the means of encouraging the great staple of America—I mean agriculture, which I think may be justly styled the staple of the United States. * * * With respect to manufactures, other countries may and do rival us, but we may be said to have a monopoly of agriculture. The possession of the soil and the lowness of its price give us as much of a monopoly in this case as any nation has the monopoly of any article whatever, but with this advantage to us, that it can neither be shared nor injured by rivalship.

These statements are as true to-day as the day they were uttered. There have been many and great changes since that time, but the relative position of agricultural to other pursuits in this country is not changed; it still retains the primacy. Manufactures have added thousands and millions to the census table of the national wealth, but agriculture has enlarged it by billions; not by acres, but by empires it has enlarged our tillable area. Since 1789 it has not only kept pace with but it has far distanced every other branch of industry.

Much now is heard in this Chamber upon the other side about the business of the country, the business interests of the country, the business of the people. What, then, is the business of the country, par excellence? The real business of this country or of any other must be that vocation in which the most of its inhabitants are engaged. The last census shows that of the whole number engaged in industrial pursuits among us, nearly one-half are farmers, and if to these be added the number of those engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements, as directly dependent on the plow as those who follow it, it will be found that those thus engaged in the tillage of the soil largely exceed in number those of any other calling, and are considerably more than those employed in all other industrial callings taken together.

And the interests of this business and the products thereof exceed those of every other and of all others in immeasurable proportion. The products, cereals and cotton, the secondary products of beef, pork, cattle—these make our exports with which we trade and pay in the open market. They make our exports, such as they are. They are not what they should be. Europeans have bought much farm produce abroad in later years—more than ever before, but not here. Neither did they voluntarily leave our markets; they have been driven hence by that embargo upon commerce, that interdict of trade induced by the policy of prohibitory tariff exclusion.

They still purchase here, not when they might, but only of necessity when they must. People will buy their grain where they sell their goods or where they have a chance of selling them; at least where they are not forbidden to sell them. The consequence is we are exporting gold to pay debts which would have been paid otherwise long ago, if we could have had a normal demand, a full market, and fair prices for the surplus products of American husbandry—the real business of the country.

Would you protect American labor or American laborers? You will find the greater part of these upon the farm. Would you protect American capital? You will find its largest, safest, and most permanent investment in the farm. All the plants of all the manufacturing machinery in the country sold in good times at fair prices would not buy the farms and their improvements in the five States formed out of that territory formerly called the Northwest. All the other great lines of industrial pursuits are secondary and in some sense dependent upon this principal vocation.

To be ringing eternal changes upon the business of the country, omitting that of the field and farm, is much as if a visitor to the capital, strolling leisurely through the Mall, should return without seeing the Monument.

Manufactures and commerce flourish best when this leading vocation of our people enjoys its greatest prosperity. The farmer is deeply interested in the repeal of the existing tariff and in the reduction of the present high rate of duty. Protection and prohibition cut him to the quick; whether he be buyer or seller, they clip his purse at both ends.

I concur in what was said the other day by the honorable Senator from Kansas who sits farthest from me [Mr. PEFFER], that the farmer is very little benefited by the duties levied upon ordinary farm produce. He is interested in the duty rate upon other articles much more. Take this as a single instance: The nearest and closest thing to the farmer not immediately connected with his own work is iron. The price of iron concerns him almost as much as that of grain. Iron is the basis of the whole metal schedule. I have the following statement of the percentage of the rates of that schedule, carefully prepared:

> Under the present law the rate is 38.48.
> Under the House bill it is 35.06.
> Under the Senate bill it is 31.53.

With iron ore on the free list, the House bill has the higher tax rate on the metal schedule; with iron ore on the dutiable list the Senate bill has the lower. This, of course, is due to its greater reduction upon the other forms and products of iron in that list. Either bill makes a reduction of 23 per cent upon the rate of the McKinley law.

This reduction upon iron and its various forms is one of the most notable features in the measure of reform. There has been no such thing for thirty-three years. It will lessen the prices of steel rails, wheels, axles, and the whole means of transportation. Lower freights and fares will follow, and the farmer will make these gains with loss to no one. Even the lips of steel of the telegraph will carry their message more joyously, relieved of the onerous tribute now paid to the wireworms of the metal trust.

This will add fertility to the soil, it will fatten the furrow, it will induce a rise long delayed in the price of lands by a large and continued appreciation of land products. It is a long step in the path of that progress which will give to what Mr. Madison called the "staple" its due and just supremacy.

We were entertained in this Chamber the other day by a résumé, very ornate and elegant, of the contrasted theories of Laissez faire and legislative intervention in the progress of human affairs, accompanied with delightful views in highly colored perspective of the beauties of the protective system. We can not afford to discuss mere abstractions. We know that neither free trade nor prohibitory tariff will produce revenue. Therein these two extremes meet. Let us avoid both, let us take the middle ground between them, like our fathers in the beginning.

It was said in that same discourse that "we should preserve our own market by making importations unprofitable." That is, by fixing tariff rates so high as to prevent importations. This is the key of what is called the protective position.

But the prohibition of imports leads directly to the formation of trusts and combinations, which control and limit production by those who own the whole commodity and mark and label their wares at their own rates and figures. And these trusts hold in their capacious pools the whole line of wares and manufactures, from a child's doll to the huge beam of structural iron and Bessemer steel. Now, if any one of the myriads of consumers in our country wants a trust article he may get it for a given sum of money, a sum fixed by the executive board or committee of the trust; if he can not or will not pay that sum, he must do without it. The trust owns and controls the entire product.

If he buys the article, what is the transaction? Is the dealer who furnishes the goods a seller? Not at all; he is only an agent or purveyor for the delivery of the trust goods. What is the customer who gets them? He has nothing to do in fixing the value of the goods or their price. Is this a market? Is not a market a place or condition where buyers and sellers may meet on equal terms, where bargains are made, and where prices are fixed and settled by mutual agreement at the time of the transaction? Here is a place and condition without purchasers, without prices, without sales. It is a hideous misnomer to call this a market. But yes, verily, this is a market. It is "our own market preserved"—pickled like a pod in a glass jar; it is the "home market," saved, secured, seasoned, salted, sealed in the tingling brine of the tariff trust.

Many centuries ago the statutes of all Europe were filled with enactments fixing the price on commodities. So many shillings a bushel, per yard, or gallon were made by law the price. This policy was long ago abandoned in all countries not only as useless, but mischievous. The protectionist has revived it in the United States.

Our ancient forefathers provided that these prices should be fixed by the Legislature or the magistrates, leaving it at least to a disinterested tribunal; but the modern protectionist, with shameless insolence, provides by law that the prices shall be fixed by the owners of the goods to be sold.

The honest dealer or manufacturer asks no protection for protection's sake; he asks none and needs none; he preserves our own market by the excellence of his wares, by his tact in suiting the taste of the purchaser, and by the fairness of his prices. Under a tariff for revenue the most heavily protected dealer or maker under the present law will keep the market in the same manner. He knows that in the face and eye of open competition he can do nothing else. No one is alarmed about the flood or deluge of foreign goods. Dealers will not wait till the ship comes in; they will discount its coming, and retain their customers by reducing prices to a fair rate. It is a well-known law of trade that the opportunity and the ability to compete has the same effect on prices as actual rivalship.

Among other things, it was again stated in the same discourse, urged with all the zeal of repetition, with all the fervor of reiteration, that the wage-earner was benefited by a high rate, by the highest rate, of taxation. To state such a fallacy is to refute it. But in behalf of this monstrous fiction we were again reminded that wages are higher in this country than in Europe. This well-worn maxim of monopoly was refurbished with such a serious air that it reminded us of that teasing bard who chaffed the katydid:

> Thou sayest an undisputed thing
> In such a solemn way.

It is true that wages are higher in this country than in Europe. We rejoice in this truth; we trust it will never be otherwise. Wages have been higher here under every form of tariff; under the highest, under the lowest, under the medium rate of taxation they have still been upheld. The wage rate in the United States has not been and could not have been maintained by the tax rate. Labor in this country owes nothing to prohibitory tariff protection.

The protection it enjoys here is self-protection—a protection self-earned, self-guaranteed and secured, fortressed in the land and homes of the free. Organized labor has earned, as it most worthily deserved, recognition under the laws of the several States in aid of the great system of voluntary association founded upon the instinct of self-preservation, and these beneficent influences have enabled the units of the laboring masses for themselves to achieve the high standard of American wages and living.

The most constant enemies of this high-wage standard have been and to-day are that class of incorporations who have controlled what are known as the protected industries. I am glad to learn that at least one Federal judge has a few days ago given judicial sanction and recognition to the rights and interests of organized labor. He has affirmed the right to quit, its lawfulness, its legality; peaceably to quit; the right to quit, a right as inalienable as the right to life or liberty.

This right is the basis of the strike, the only effectual remonstrance against the tyranny and oppression of the incorporated employer. This right distinguishes the man, the free agent, from the machine or the automaton. It differences the labor of a free man or woman from that of the horse or the ox or the steam engine or the electric motor. It does not inhere in charters or ordinances, not even in flesh and blood, but it inheres in the will, the will of the worker; it is an attribute of the heart, of the mind, of the soul, and, like the spirit, indestructible.

The recognition of this right will lead gradually to a readjustment of the relations between the employed and their employers; it will allay and assuage hatred and animosities; it will induce a peaceable arbitrament of differences between them. We may safely leave labor, under the auspices of this benign judgment, in its own hands for protection, a protection real and actual, builded upon the justice of its cause.

I do not propose to compare the merits of the House and Senate bills. Each has its peculiar advantages; but there are some most beneficent features which are common to both. Both carry with them an unconditional repeal of the McKinley act, a proposal so large and gracious that it suffices to cover all over a multitude of minor defects. Both enlarge the free list and reduce taxation upon the means of life and living. In one respect the two bills are one. They put revenue at the front and keep it there. They alike discard and ignore the dogma and the practice of prohibitory protection. Both these bills reaffirm and reproclaim the truth set forth by our illustrious statesmen of the Revolution in the first law of the First Congress on this subject. "It is not lawful to tax all the people except for the benefit of all, nor for any less number."

Both these bills lay a tax on sugar; they differ as to the rate and as to the grade of sugar so taxed; but neither of them places upon any sort of sugar a tax of 2 cents a pound, such as is imposed in the present law. There is one branch of manufactures which our committees have seen fit wholly to destroy—the bounty on bonbons, comfits, and confections of the saccharine subsidy trust.

We have paid off the sugar pensions for the last year—$12,000,000. This payment helped to make the deficit and to compel the loan by the Treasury.

Upon inquiry at the office of the Attorney-General it will be found that in a few days we shall have settled and paid off the last of the election pensions, the per diem and mileage of the Republican marshals and supervisors who strove so hard in their attempt to protect protection at the polls.

When we have at last paid off all the sugar pensions and the election pensions granted under the old law, and forbidden any such things under the new, the taxes paid by the people will be honestly used to pay other debts and dues of the United States of infinitely greater obligation and importance.

It has been said that we must approach the task of tariff reform very cautiously and circumspectly, that the work must be done slowly, that many of the changes proposed are violent and revolutionary, and they will disarrange the affairs and disturb the existing relations of trade and exchange. Is good ever to take the place of evil or supplant it without some sort of change and agitation?

There have been four principal changes in the tariff law since the war; the first in 1861, the second in 1867, the third in 1883, the last in 1890. All these changes were made in the same direction—upward. I had the honor of serving here at the time of the passage of the McKinley act, the last and highest assessment made in this sort of taxation. That bill, like the others, was passed by the Republican majority without the slightest regard to the effect of change or disarrangement now so much bruited.

That act was passed here after it had been overwhelmingly condemned by the people at the polls. It was asked with exceeding indignation, on the other side of the Chamber, why should the protected industries be hindered in their peaceful vocation of pillage merely because the plain people of the country had objected to such pursuits? The bill was passed, nevertheless, with earnest opposition upon our part; without the slightest factious opposition it became the law, marking the highest degree upon the tariff protection barometer.

We may now very clearly comprehend the philosophy of disturbance. As long as taxes are made higher, all is peace and quiet; when it is proposed to make taxes lower, then there is a great outcry about frightful disorder.

It is true the financial condition has changed much since the last Presidential election, and yet more since the meeting of the two national conventions at Minneapolis and Chicago. We have been touched—touched as an earthquake touches a province or an island in the sea—with sudden ruin and disaster; we are yet trembling from the effects of this touch.

This great catastrophe befell the country when all the Republican policies of finance, trade, and taxation were in full force and vigor. That these policies should have existed and been in operation during quiet times and ordinary seasons might be expected, but we have been constantly told, nay assured, by our political opponents that they were steadfast, stable, permanent—that they would answer any emergency and stand the test of every storm and trial.

The McKinley act was to furnish under all circumstances sufficient, abundantly sufficient revenue for the support of the Government. Instead of that we find a deficit in the third year after its enactment—a deficit threatening to grow larger. It had promised increase of wages and of work. The army of the unemployed has steadily added to its forces, and wages have as steadily diminished. How did the Sherman act, a masterpiece in finance, so called, and all these others meet the touch? How did they resist it? How did they withstand its impact? They shrunk at its first approach; they fled with terror when it came.

Only months afterwards did this same class of financiers who gave us these measures as law muster up courage, backed by the most disinterested and unselfish patriotism, to lend at a high rate of interest to the Government money to tide over the deficit which their own policy had created.

Instead of the present troubled conditions being an argument for the continuance of the existing laws they make the strongest reason for their immediate and speedy abrogation.

The Constitution provides that Congress shall have the power to levy and collect duties, imposts, and excises. These three modes of taxation are in the same clause; they stand upon the same and equal footing. All and each received the sanction and approval of our fundamental lawgivers. No objection can be made to their constitutionality. The whole question, if one be raised as to the exercise of either, is one of expediency. Neither can be denounced as un-American, as contrary to the spirit of our institutions, as monarchical, or as contrary to any phase of freedom. To do this is to accuse Franklin of betraying liberty, and to denounce Washington as wanting in wisdom or patriotism.

Excise is probably the oldest method of taxation. It at first was a tax paid in kind. As its name implies, something cut from or taken out of the articles taxed, things always actual and tangible. The impost was a sum imposed, placed upon things not so tangible, such as incomes, sales, rents, contracts, deeds. The postal rates are instances of imposts usually paid in advance. Duties were taxes of a mixed character, partaking of the nature of both excise and imposts. Duties are imposed, like imposts proper, upon goods imported, but they are paid in money, never in kind, as excises were formerly paid. All of these taxes are levied upon the avails or proceeds of property of some kind, tangible or incorporeal. Excises, for example, those upon spirits and tobacco, are levied upon sales. Duties are of the same character. The income tax is an impost usually assessed upon revenues, corporate or individual.

None of these taxes are direct. The States alone ordinarily levy taxes upon property as such, to be paid by the owner. The tax upon sales, whether it be called excise or duties, whether it be laid upon foreign or domestic goods, is levied not upon the property, but upon the anticipated proceeds of the sale, and is paid at last by the purchaser. All three of these taxes are indirect, but the most indirect is the tax upon incomes. The owner of an income may not be the owner of any property at all in the common sense of the term, as witness the case of the salary of a Federal officer of over $4,000, who may be the owner of nothing else.

The income tax might have been made indirect in like degree with duties and excises; it might have been placed upon rents, profits, issues, or receipts, as is usually done, but it is not; it is placed by the terms of this bill not upon revenue in the first instance, corporate or individual, but upon the net proceeds or receipts after deducting all expenses. Upon the clear cash income of $4,000 2 per cent is levied as taxes due the Government. And this tax is thus far removed, very remotely connected with the actual property which may furnish the revenue so subjected to taxation. If taxation is to be commended because it is indirect and is to be denounced for the reason that it is direct, then the income tax as levied in this bill is the most worthy of praise and the least obnoxious to censure. The man who lauds the tariff as indirect taxation ought to yet more favor the income tax as much more indirect.

This sort of tax is not a new thing in the fiscal policy of the country. It has been said that the very active and zealous political organization so ably represented by my friend the Senator from Nebraska who sits near me [Mr. ALLEN] recommended it in their last platform, which is true; but they would hardly lay claim to it as an original invention. The Populists must have copied it, and the committees of the two Houses are hardly amenable to the charge of having copied from copyists. The committees followed older models. The real discoverers of the income tax were for this country the makers of the Constitution when they authorized the Congress to levy and collect imposts.

I have read with closest scrutiny the schedules of the commodities exempt from duty in the pending bill and in the amendments thereto. I have read them with great care, and indeed I thought at first that the committee might have made a mistake or an omission; but I have not been able hitherto to find that incomes are on the free list of either bill. There is quite a variety of articles which are exempted from taxation in both bills, such as salt, lumber, wool, binding twine, cotton ties, and quinine.

Which of these, or of two or three of these, shall we strike off in order to put incomes on the free list? There are 70,000,000 of our people who would be liable to pay taxes imposed upon salt or wool or lumber, synonymous as they are with food, raiment, and shelter. There are perhaps 100,000 of our people who will be liable to pay taxes upon income. I know not what course others may take, but if we are to have exemptions, I favor free-listing the millions of men rather than the millions of money.

It is a grievous error to assume that those who are called the poor pay no taxes, or no Federal taxes. The tariff is above all else a tax upon consumption. No living soul can escape it, and even the garments of the dead are not exempt from its ceaseless exactions. We do not complain of the universality of the burden; it is right, in a certain sense, that every inhabitant should pay something toward the support of the Government. But our just cause of complaint is that these contributions to the support of the Government are and have been under existing law needlessly increased and unjustly proportioned. The remonstrance is not against taxation, however general, but against its unfair apportionment.

Let the infant be taxed, as it is taxed, yet the child born far away from the purple, cradled in the arms of poverty, without speech or knowledge, in its dumb helplessness makes the argument for free wool.

It is said that this exemption will destroy the sheep husbandry, will deteriorate the breed and value of the sheep in the United States. I do not believe this. The facts in the case disprove it; but even if this assumption were true, I know this exemption, with its cognate reduction, will make blankets and flannels cheaper, and I prefer the rearing of our boys and girls in health and comfort to the raising of even the choicest varieties of the Cotswold or the Southdown. Not only do those who are called poor pay Federal taxes, but they pay an immeasurably larger portion than any others, both absolutely and relatively—absolutely as to the amount, relatively in proportion to their means of payment.

The whole number of citizens are consumers; nineteen-twentieths of this number are those called poor. The tariff tax upon consumption touches all, and the poor pay by far the most because they are the most.

Not only do those who are called the poor pay the greater part of the Federal taxes, but every one of them pays tax upon his income. Not one is exempt. What is the income of the daily laborer? His daily wages. How is this expended? In procuring clothes, food, and lodging for himself and his. Are these untaxed?

What is the income of the farmer in moderate circumstances, tilling his own land? What is his income? The proceeds of his crop. How is it laid out? In buying the necessaries of subsistence and the making and marketing of his produce. Are those exempt from taxation?

It is true that the wealthy citizen, well enough off to enjoy a net income of $4,000, pays these taxes also; but how does he pay them? Out of his abundance he pays them; without a thought, without a care; but the other, out of his poverty, out of his necessity, pays them, with thought, with anxious care for the morrow.

To equalize this disproportion, especially in season of heavy financial and monetary strain, our fathers provided for the special taxes called imposts and excises.

It was asked in a discussion of this subject the other day in this Chamber what States pay the income tax? The answer is, no State pays it; not a penny of it is paid by any State. It is a tax, not upon cities or counties or States, but upon corporate and personal revenue, net receipts upon investments. As far as it may be considered as a personal tax, it is assessed upon citizens, not of any particular State or section, but upon all the citizens of the several States and Territories who have incomes reaching the taxable amount and upon corporations of like character. It is said 30 per cent of the old income tax was paid by the citizens and corporations of New York. Granted, and that a like portion will be paid under the new from the same sources. Granted.

The best authorities tell us that one-half, many say that two-thirds, of the tariff tax is paid in the first instance by those who reside in New York. Are these duties therefore sectional? A very large amount of the taxes upon tobacco and spirits is thus also paid by those who reside in the State of New York. Are these excises, therefore, sectional? How, then, does the tax upon incomes become sectional? And if these taxes, the tariff and the excises, are to be denounced and rejected as sectional, by reason of their place of payment, where shall we collect taxes to pay the public expenditures? All this only shows that the residents of that State are the most wealthy, as they are the most numerous, community in the household of the States. Subject as they are to the law of the whole Union and to the duties, excises, and imposts established by it, their people pay these taxes in no unjust proportion, in fact in no other proportion than the inhabitants of any other part of the country.

It is the aggregate that differences the contribution of the men of New York from those of others, not disproportion. The rate is not variable; it is 2 per cent in New York as in Indiana, as it is in Idaho.

Not without a vast return of distinctive favors and benefits do the citizens of this great State of New York pay the pittance levied by the pending bill.

At the close of the Revolutionary war and up to the time of the formation of the present Government, New York was one harbor among many upon the Atlantic coast of no special eminence; indeed more than equaled by Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, and Savannah in various lines both of imports and exports. But when the Union was formed, and under its law commerce among the several States was made free, when the States were forbidden to lay imposts; when colonial and provincial restrictions were removed: when unimpeded interstate trade became a fact accomplished, then the city and the harbor of New York became the great entrepôt of both domestic and foreign trade, the goal of all commodities, the mistress of all prices, and so remains even unto this day.

The canal and the railroad, all the growths of civilization, have added to her commanding resources. It was the formation of the Union and the law of the Union, in its great and decisive feature of detail, securing these broad interstate commercial franchises, which gave to the people of that State their sumless wealth which enabled them justly to assume in the marts of our extended trade the name and power of Empire.

For more than a hundred years the old West and the new, the old South and the new, have poured their riches with unstinted hand into the lap of Manhattan. We have not envied, we have rather taken pride in the prosperity of this imperial member of the sisterhood of States. We only wonder that the people of this State should perchance shun, should in any wise miss, the blessing and the glory of the mite cast into the Treasury.

It is objected that the tax upon incomes is unusual and not ordinary; that it is a war tax, presumably only properly levied in war times. But the former income tax, with its methods and machinery similar to those in the bill under consideration, had the approval of the highest judicial tribunal in the land, and lasted ten years, from 1863 to 1873. The war closed in 1865; so that it is very plain that the war tax outlasted the war itself and was assessed and paid for years in time of peace. The debt of the war continued after the war, and created the necessity for special methods of raising funds for its liquidation. Since that time one sort of the debt has been greatly lessened, called the funded debt; another has been much increased and is yet maturing, falling due every day. It is not when a debt is contracted that the pecuniary pinch is felt, but when it falls due for payment. We have no taxes laid upon us for the support of large standing armies like those of the Old World, but we have an army that has stood in that fierce four years of battle which gave to us national unity and peace.

The pension bill in the present Congress carries $150,000,000. This is an extraordinary expenditure, far exceeding the sum so expended in 1873. It is a part of the war debt, secured by constitutional ordinance. The pension is a vested right, as sacred as a bond. This vast expenditure, with others, is now to be met in an extraordinary time, a time when the common resources of both cash and credit, strained to their utmost capacity, fail to show their usual efficiency; a time when both the people and the Government are in pecuniary straits, narrow and pressing as have ever befallen us.

What, then, is wise, prudent, and circumspect conduct in the present exigency? To provide with a certainty beyond the chance of failure for the maintenance of the national faith and credit. It will cost much to do this, but it will cost much more not to do it. When the present troubles shall be overpassed, as they will be, we can return as before to the usual and ordinary methods of raising money for the support of the Government.

I very much preferred, as some of my colleagues on this side, the free list of the House bill unchanged. But this preference does not justify us in an endeavor to delay or defeat the pending bill, or to grant a further lease of life to the McKinley act. Under the almost equal status of parties on this floor, it is not a question which of the two bills may be favored, but whether any reform bill can receive the vote of a majority.

While there can be no quarrel with any friendly criticism or with any suggested amendments consistent with the main scheme and policy and not destructive of any of its chief provisions, yet it must not be forgotten that the bill now pending, subject to the ordinary and usual parliamentary changes, is the official act and deed of the Democratic party of the two Houses as here represented. As such it is fairly entitled to the earnest and bona fide support of every member of the party who has a seat in either branch of the present Congress. Not only should this support be loyally tendered on its final passage, but at every intervening stage of its progress. Up to a certain line dissent may be amicable; at some point it must cease, or, if continued, it will result in division, division which may do us a present mischief beyond repair, and it may also become the subject of very serious reflection what degree of weight shall be given to motions and suggestions, latent in their character, not disclosed, coming from any of those, if such there be, who find it so very difficult to abide with us.

Consider what large exhortation we have on this side to duty, to unity, to fidelity. Our own once high hopes and aspirations of the success of the present session, the prayers and wishes of the generous constituencies who sent us hither, the memories of that famous victory which we shared together in common joy and triumph—these persuade, admonish, beseech, entreat us to early and united action; for there is no solution, chemical or fiscal, of the rates on sugar; there is no demurrer to the minutiæ of the income clause; there is nothing like unto this or that which can condone sedition or desertion. He who leaves us now has never at heart been with us. He will go unto his own place. We will remain in ours.

I am not gifted with that prescience of the future which enables me to foretell the fortunes of this bill, whether it shall pass or no: but in either or any event there can be no death or dissolution of the Democratic party or extinction of the principles of tariff reform.

As it has been written, To labor without seeing the end of our labors; to sow and not to reap; to stand long years only in hope and expectation, not in possession; to wait and to work; to brook delay and disappointment, is a rule and law in the history of reformation from which the highest and noblest of its characters have never been exempt.

I have often wished I could set the minds of certain of those among us upon consideration of the commercial value of justice, the mere money worth of it, if Senators are unconcerned about its other attributes. How rich a people grow who are conscious of the exercise of justice and fair dealing toward them by their rulers; how well to do that nation becomes, and all the men and women in it, when they feel that the burdens of government are distributed and borne in due proportion, and that its favors may be equally shared by all! What vast wealth of affection, age after age, is accumulated in that land where the right is deemed always the expedient!

How sordid, selfish, and ignoble is that appeal to the citizen which offers special favors to a part which it denies to the whole! What is protection but a bribe, and what have bribes to do with justice? And what gains can it deliver to the—

which are not losses to the many, the greater number? It may then be known what the American Democracy is. It has no hostility to wealth or capital. The free and princely heart of liberty would not only allow but assure to every man his earnings and possessions, great or small; and yet the small, and even the smallest—the humble homes, the lowly hearths—these are nearest to it. The Democratic sentiment has no reverence for wealth.

It reveres only man—man for what he is, not for what he has. It obeys only the will of the majority, and thinks it no wrong that the rights and the interests of the many should find their due expression in the law. It altogether declines to contract or to compare rights with interests—pecuniary interests. It puts no price on its most precious possessions. It would rather that the whole machinery and paraphernalia of protected industries should perish in the fervent heat of a single conflagration than that the habeas corpus should be wrongfully denied or questioned or that fetters should be forged in any form upon the freedom of work or of worship.

One of the things most desired by it is to promote the education of the people, to diffuse knowledge, to foster the material and physical advancement of every art and industry. But it knows that these alone will not preserve, and that they may be closely connected with other things not consistent with the growth and thrift of, liberty. Science serves the master with somewhat indifferent hand. The electric scourge, with its indescribable torture, is the substitute of applied science for the knout: the naphtha and the dynamite projectile are used with equal skill at the mouth of the Neva as at the Narrows. Hence American Democracy, looking far beyond the schools and their philosophies, appeals to the sense and love of justice in our race, to that equality which is always equity, both in the administration and in the making of the law, as the surest foundation of free institutions.

This appeal will not fail forever. Justice may be delayed, beaten, baffled, bruised, even betrayed or wounded by the way, but it will arrive at last; it waits, and it is waiting now, in the chill of the early dawn: yet it will have its day—a day perfect, unbroken, without sunset or decline, which no power shall shorten.

Is this a time for argument, for question and reply, for debate and disquisition? Acts are now better than words, and to hearken and answer rightly to the roll call is better than much speaking.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, for a hundred years this matter of a protective tariff has been thrashed out between the two or three great parties and the two or three great interests of the United States, and still it remains as serious as when it nearly broke the Union sixty years ago. In one sense it is now more serious than then, because the interests which it involves have steadily become larger, until now they are immeasurable. This is my excuse for once more taking a few moments of the time of the Senate. In the course of a hundred years many conditions have changed. The world, which was then large, has become small. Interests which were then free for indefinite expansion are now cramped for space. The power of production, which was then slight, is now without limit. Races which were then beyond chance of contact are now in close competition. Capital, which then hardly existed as an organized force, is now massed in a common organization, which undertakes to control the world. Political economy has changed with the conditions. The capitalist has one set of principles; the laborer has another; the farmer has a third; and here in Congress, where all these interests and ideas meet and clash together, we are throwing ourselves from one to another without a notion where we are at last to rest.

Some months ago I ventured to point out to the Senate in the silver debate what I believed to be the steadiest political instinct of our people. I then said, what I want now to repeat, that tariff and silver were only two sides of the same question. The whole matter in dispute is whether we are to keep America in economical dependence on Europe, or whether we are to struggle for an independent position of our own. I believe that a great majority of our people want to maintain national independence in their economy as well as in their politics. As far as concerns the State for which I have the honor to speak, I suppose its wish is practically unanimous. To this instinct Pennsylvania has always been true.

In matters which concern national character I trust popular instincts and even popular prejudices. We are now running dangerously near a betrayal of both. We are surrendering our strongest positions, one after another, to an authority which is not ours. Granting, for argument's sake, what is charged against the tariff, that it surrenders our people to the American capitalist, can that be a reason for turning about and handing both our capital and our people over to the foreign capitalists? Granting that capital has become too powerful, what form of capital is most dangerous, most grasping, most selfish—our own, which we can and will control, or the foreign, which is beyond our reach?

The interests which are arrayed in support of the present measure, as far as it tends towards free trade are mainly three: First of all, and most powerful, is that remarkable cosmopolite moneyed interest, which belongs to no country, and more or less rules all, but which whether it is found in Europe or America, or in the remotest corners of the earth, has always its heart, its head, its energy, its mass, in the city of London. Next come the farmers of the South and West, who have always, by the force of their own interests, been subject to the same magnet, because their market is London. I find no fault with them for it, as the moneyed interest of England, for the last half century, has deliberately sacrificed its own agriculture in order to patronize ours. The third influence behind the present bill is that of the class which, for want of any other name, I am obliged to call Mugwumps, who gravitate naturally towards what they believe to be English, and who take their impulse from the city of London, because the city of London, in finance, controls England.

These three parties, even combined, could not alone have reversed our fixed policy; but in the last general election they were joined by numbers of the laboring class who were for the moment discontented and alarmed. Their added influence turned the scale, and although they have long since come back to their true allegiance to their own industries, they can not undo what was then done.

These four bodies of men made a temporary majority, but of them all the only one that is steady to its object, and always has been, and always will be where it now stands, was the foreign moneyed interest that centers in the city of London. That interest acts as one mass. Its influence is very great. Perhaps in the long run it is irresistible; our cities and financial centers all obey it. Our constitutional fault-finders, the Mugwumps, all are at its command. The laboring people not only here, but everywhere, found their history upon it, and develop their principles in opposition to it. So agressive is it, that when the silver question was under debate last September, I ventured to say to the Senate that any measure advocated by the moneyed interests of England ought, for that reason alone, to be suspicious to us; that this objection alone ought to throw the burden of proof on the friends of the measure, and until they had proved its necessity, we were justified in voting against it.

The measure then in question was the establishment of a monometallic gold currency. I noticed that no Senator met the objection. From the beginning to the end of that long debate not one voice, in either Houses of Congress, was raised in defense of a monometallic gold currency. Even to-day I do not believe that one Senator would be willing openly to advocate it. Yet the Senate was obliged to vote for it. We have a monometallic gold currency to-day. We have no prospect of getting rid of it. Our submission to the moneyed interest of England has been silent, but it has been abject.

Next comes the tariff. I will not waste time in showing how deeply the foreign moneyed interest has always resented our tariff policy. The last tariff especially exasperated British influences to such a point that England would not take part in our Chicago Exposition, and millions of our people were invited to notice, not only that England sent few exhibits, but that she honestly believes the Chicago Fair to have been a failure owing to her abstention. Every American who has been in England or has ever talked with an Englishman knows how frankly Englishmen talk on the subject. I do not refer to Englishmen who stand outside of moneyed interests, for they are not in the discussion at all. I am speaking of English capitalists or Englishmen in the service of capital; men whose business it is to make money and who want to make it in America. The tariff stood in their way. In order to employ British capital in America they were obliged in some degree to make it American.

I am well aware, Mr. President, that my views on the foreign moneyed influence seem to many persons, whom I respect, not only narrow, but reactionary. They think they know all about it and then turn away at once in disgust. The true mugwump begins by assuming that an American Senator or Representative must be ignorant, and may be narrow. The misunderstanding is a part of my argument; for to me they seem to be living on the ideas that ruled England in the last generation. A Senator of the United States can not help becoming better acquainted than most private citizens with the interests, the forces, the conflicting aims, the hopes and fears, the successes and dangers of the people. He may be mistaken, but he must see over a wide space. The view I have taken is forced on me by all the last and newest difficulties of our time. It has no more to do with the difficulties of the last century than it has with the caravels of Columbus. We are facing problems created in our own time, the product of the last half century, which the world has not known till now. Every one of our troubles is a new variety of disease, and must be dealt with by some new diagnosis. Particularly this matter of the foreign moneyed interest, which is, in one form or another, as old as America itself, comes up now in a new shape.

If our own recollections did not prove it, the increased pressure on us of capitalists, manufacturers, corporations, trades unions, socialists, and anarchists forces us to notice that this moneyed interest, in its present form, is a new political difficulty. Our situation is serious enough between our own capital and the labor it employs, but when this is complicated by the larger question of the foreign moneyed interest it becomes wholly unmanageable. Only about fifty years have passed since the moneyed interest of Europe acquired its present organization, and it has grown so rapidly as already to throw the shadow of capital, with its reaction in socialism and anarchy, over all Europe and America. With that I will not now meddle. The subject is too large to be discussed now. We are dealing with the tariff. We want to place ourselves on a principle.

We intend to appeal to the people, and we want the issue clear and strong. As a rule we are not here professors of history; we have no time, and should talk to no purpose even if we had the time to explain how some fifty years ago the monoyed interest of England established its supremacy, or to make clear the steps by which it built up its machinery of capitalistic productions, and, by buying in the cheapest markets what it sold in the dearest, ended by spreading its sway through the world. The steamship, the railroad, and the telegraph became its slaves to concentrate all power in its hands. It dug through continents, united oceans, and has turned fully two-thirds of the population of the world into the organized service of an organized capital, centering in London. We know how we tried at times to resist it, and how at times we submitted to it; how we built up walls against it, and pulled them down again. For more than thirty years we have been true to the policy of resistance; but meanwhile the moneyed interest of Europe has reached a point such as never was imagined before our time. It has reached the limits of possible development. It has mastered nearly the whole earth.

This huge growth, more rapid than the world ever before has seen, must have some limit, and at its rate of the last fifty years that limit must be near. Since 1873 many signs seem to show that the limit is reached. The financial disasters of the last few years prove that, for the time, the growth of the British system has been checked, and that, if we are not overwhelmed by the shock, we may maintain our separate interest. Yet this moment of all others is chosen by the Congress of the United States to come to England's aid.

We were told to destroy silver because it was a mark of our independence, and we did so for no other reason than to remain in the moneyed system of England. And now that tariff which has been the chief object of antipathy to the British moneyed interests is also to be overthrown. We have sacrificed our whole country west of the Mississippi on the silver issue, we are now going to sacrifice the whole country east of the Mississippi in the tariff in order to open new markets for foreign capital in foreign industries.

Here again, as in the silver debate, we are told, by what I presume is to be treated as the highest authority, that we are wrong, and that the surest way of resisting British moneyed interests is to submit to it. If that argument had force to cover our cowardice in the silver issue, it can not serve an instant to cover the betrayal of our other industries. The only attempt to excuse this bill, on the ground of national interest, is that it will reduce the cost of production so as to enable us to compete with Europe in the markets of the world. I suppose this argument to be seriously made, and that its authors believe it to be sound. The more we sacrifice ourselves the greater is to be our profit. The idea comes from England. The authors of this bill are fumbling over the political economy of fifty years ago. They are echoing old commonplaces of Bright and Cobden and the Free Trade League. To what new world are they going for their markets? Since the British moneyed interest adopted those ideas fifty years ago, the world has been ransacked for markets to the uttermost limits and narrowed to a single community in which competition is carried to its last possible point. If any market were left, English industries would not be now in their desperate condition.

The world contains now no markets in which we could compete on a gold basis without the complete and permanent sacrifice of our laborers. Europe can always squeeze her laborers to a lower stage of misery than we can risk with ours. Any approach to competition in the so-called markets of the world can only be made by carrying British methods further than they are or can be carried in Europe. We must concentrate capital here in greater and greater masses; we must crush our our small capitalists and weak industries; we must adopt the British system of industry and exaggerate it; but first of all we must create an immense surplus laboring class of half employed, half paid, and half fed, but wholly discontented citizens.

No other course is possible, even if we succeed in underselling Europe. We can compete only by carrying the European system beyond the European point. Ultimately labor must pay the bill, as it pays all other bills. What else can pay it? What else has paid such bills elsewhere? The more intelligent our labor is, the heavier load it must bear. Every intelligent trades unionist knows that lesson by heart. Once started on that path the whole mass of labor must follow it to the lowest possible market. For fifty years the markets of the world have been occupied by Europe, and developed to a fraction of a cent, with every element calculated and economized to the last possible point of European competition. In order to reach them we have got to force the European system of capital and labor beyond the European mark although that is beyond the danger mark. In such an attempt total failure is the happiest possible result. Labor has even now a harder lot than it had fifty years ago. The chance to rise in the world has already so nearly vanished as to be worth nothing to it. No act of mine shall tend to hasten the process of closing to it the rare outlets it still has to rise above its daily risk of wanting wages and bread.

Our laborers know all this better than any one else does, and it is not from them that this bill, or any free-trade measure, will receive support.

The Republican party has again and again recognized their wants, and has done all in its power to help them. We all know that when agriculture suffers the country is in a bad way; but what is the cause of agriculture suffering throughout the world? The cause is always the same. The world has been reduced, or is being reduced, to one community, controlled by one mass of capital, with unlimited competition of industry, and especially of agricultural industry. The whole mass tends every year more and more towards a common average. The grains of California and Dakota meet the grains of Russia and India in London, in one common market, which is controlled by some sort of average, and their condition must follow it; but what possible average can exist between the social condition of the American farmer, the Russian peasant, and the Indian ryot? The marvelous triumphs of our moneyed interests in our own generation have so cheapened the cost of transport and increased its capacity that the Russian peasant of to-day is hardly so far away as the man in the next county was a hundred years ago.

Agricultural competition is deadly. It means, under its last conditions, that great classes of a community may be wiped out. In other conditions it means that the competing classes must tend to an average. I have not cared to inquire what the social conditions of the Russian peasant or the Indian ryot may be on a money scale; but I suppose that 5 cents a day would represent it favorably. Some kind of an average between these earnings and those of the American farmer must be struck; and this it is which is now dragging our agriculture down. I presume this is admitted by all. I suppose that we all equally regret it.

But how can we change or improve the farmer's situation by lowering the tariff? Even free trade can only aggravate the competition and hurry the process. The nearer we come to free trade the more violent the competition must be. Of all countries, the one whose agriculture has suffered the most, in spite of immense assistance from capital, has been England. There both farmer and landed proprietor have been almost swept out of existence as a solvent class, and among them now, even after half a century of experiment in that home of free trade, you can hear drop no word of praise for free trade or unlimited competition. Slowly and certainly the whole agricultural class has declined and dwindled, and if our farmers want to read their own story in a worse form they should study the effects of free trade in a whole library of British Parliamentary Reports on the depressed condition of British agriculture.

Our American farmers have had one or two decided advantages, and one of them has been the growth of local markets, which are more or less helped or stimulated by the tariff. They are now ready to sacrifice these local markets in order to stimulate the European. They may not wish it, but they will do it, if they feel that they can get help in no other way. Against desperation I can not argue. The danger of our agricultural class is grave enough to shake all barriers of party and unite us in a common sympathy. I would gladly unite with anyone to help and relieve the farmer by any legislation that would not certainly aggravate the disease. I proved it by giving him all the support I could in the case of silver, where his interests were chiefly at stake. I will prove it again whenever the chance offers, but I can not join him or help him to pull down the tariff in order to stimulate, to intensify, to extend, to deepen the effects of the very competition with foreign races which is slowly grinding into the dust with equal mercilessness the American and the European cultivator of the soil.

Yet, in spite of all his trials and temptations, the farmer is an American and can be counted as an independent citizen. The laborer and trades unionist is also American. Every form of our industry is American, and sooner or later can be reached by an appeal to its best interests.

The only classes that stand beyond appeal or argument are the money lender and the Mugwump. The interests of the one, the sycophancy of the other, are bound to Europe. As long as Europe remains the center of capital the money lender and the Mugwump must owe allegiance there. From all the rest of our people, whatever their differences be, we can hope for common action in a common public spirit. They never have been and never can be long satisfied with this idea of fighting their battles by surrendering in advance to their enemies. The thing has been tried again and again, always with the same result. At one time the people have revolted because they saw that the idea was cowardly. At another time they have rebelled because they saw that it was stupid.

The situation of the world to-day is more critical than ever before in our time. The people will see it and act as soon as we can reach them. I do not fear the result.

For my own part I want to do more than restore the tariff. The tariff alone is not enough to make a complete or a strong national policy. On the tariff alone I can not appeal with confidence to the whole people. I repeat and I insist that the tariff and silver are two sides of the same issue. They are bound together by necessity. The one without the other must break down. Both together are invincible. The people of the Union, North and South, East and West, can all understand and unite on a national policy that unites these two great forces. They are neither money-lenders nor Mugwumps. They feel their interests more truly than all the newspapers and lecturers in the world can teach. They will not be afraid to cut wholly loose from Europe. They will be glad and proud to restore silver; to place the United States at the head of the silver-using countries of the world. Such a policy would satisfy their true instincts. With all America at their side and all Asia at their back, they could then isolate Europe and force England to follow or to fail. To such a policy tariffs could offer no obstacle. The barrier of gold would be more fatal than any barrier of a custom-house. The bond of silver would be stronger than any bond of free trade.

Whatever party first comes to this political platform will win a victory; and it is easier for the Republicans to take this ground than for their opponents, who have destroyed silver and are pledged to hostility against an American policy, whether in industry or trade. Standing on these as supports, the United States may hope to extend their influence over the world: but so long as they narrow their ambition to becoming a larger England, or a more German Germany, they can become nothing worth their trouble and can win no markets worth having—not even their own.

Mr. QUAY resumed the floor in continuation of the speech begun by him on the 14th instant. After having spoken one hour and a half,

Mr. ALLISON (at 5 o'clock p. m.). Would the Senator from Pennsylvania prefer to go on further this evening? I see it is about 5 o'clock.

Mr. QUAY. If it is not objectionable to the Senate, I can conclude, I think, in about five minutes my remarks upon this branch of the bill, which the Senator will notice is confined to iron and steel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Senator from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will so indicate at the time when he would desire to stop for this evening, I shall at that time move an executive session for a few minutes.

Mr. QUAY. I presume the Senator from Tennessee did not hear my remark. I do not think I shall occupy more than five minutes further on this branch of the subject.

Mr. HARRIS. I so understood the Senator, and simply ask if he will indicate his wish at the time when he would prefer to stop, and then the Senate will devote itself to some other business.

Mr. QUAY. Certainly. I will give way in a few minutes to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

After having further spoken for three minutes,

Mr. QUAY said: I had intended to present at some length to the Senate my views upon certain paragraphs in the iron and steel schedule of the bill, but I believe I will dismiss the subject until the bill is considered by paragraphs. I am now ready to give way to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who wishes an executive session, with the understanding that I shall have the floor to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before recognizing the Senator from Tennessee for the purpose indicated, the Chair will lay before the Senate certain matters on the Vice-President's table.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

[Mr. QUAY'S speech will be published entire after it shall have been concluded.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 18, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. REED (before the reading of the Journal was concluded). Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether, on the vote taken under the new rule, the names of those present and not voting are recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not an opportunity of examining the Journal until a few minutes before the meeting of the House. Those names ought to be entered on the Journal. There is an error in the RECORD. Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana, as the Chair understands, voted; and Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio answered "present."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana was not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was in error. The gentleman from Indiana did not vote; and his name should appear in the list of those not voting.

Mr. REED. Why is his name put among those present but not voting?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been trying to ascertain how that mistake occurred.

Mr. REED. I should like to know whether it is an error of the tellers or of the Clerk.

Mr. TRACEY. I think we had better go back to the old rule.

The SPEAKER. The tellers made no report—the rule did not require it—of those gentlemen who answered "present." The Chair was informed this morning by one of the reporters that this mistake occurred in the Printing Office. The Chair has no personal knowledge on the subject. He regrets that he had not an opportunity to examine the Journal earlier; he will try hereafter to have such opportunity, and will require the Journal to be finished a little earlier. The Clerk will read the names of the two gentlemen who answered "present," and they will appear upon the Journal.

The Clerk, continuing the reading of the Journal, read the names of Mr. DALZELL and Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio.

The reading of the Journal having been concluded—

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal as read will be approved.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege connected with the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURROWS. If the Speaker will turn to page 4663 of the daily RECORD of the proceedings of yesterday, under the head of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, it will be observed that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] had the floor and yielded one minute only to the gentleman from Alabama, and if the Speaker will then take the time to glance at the length of that one-minute speech, he will see that the gentleman from Alabama was able in that time to fill more than four columns of the RECORD. I know that he is a very rapid talker, but I doubt very much whether within one minute he would be able to fill the daily RECORD from page 4613 to 4665.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Michigan that the gentleman from Alabama is not in his seat, and it would be well, perhaps, to let this go over until he is present.

Mr. REED. It is his duty to be here. If we had a proper system of fines he would be here.

Mr. BURROWS. I think—I am not certain—but I think objection was made to extending remarks in the RECORD on the subject then under consideration. I was under that impression when the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] had the floor and asked for an extension of time, and I objected. I do not suppose that under the rules a gentleman having the floor for one minute would have the right to extend his remarks indefinitely in the RECORD; and I think the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] ought to be in some way expunged from the RECORD or the practice in such cases definitely settled. Having called attention to the matter, however, I have no objection to allowing it to go over until to-morrow morning or until the gentleman from Alabama is present. Of course if he uttered the speech as printed on the floor of the House in the one minute's time accorded him then there is no criticism to be made. If he did not, I insist he violated the rules of the House and that some action should be taken.

The SPEAKER. Objection was made to extending remarks in the RECORD, and the Chair thinks no gentleman had a right to go further than the rules permitted, which would simply be a revision of such remarks as he did utter.

Mr. BURROWS. If the Chair thinks it better to lie over——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to have it go over for the present.

Mr. BURROWS. I have no objection to that.

The Journal as read was then approved.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION, NEW ORLEANS MINT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for wages of workmen and adjusters of the mint at New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. APSLEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BOWERS of California, for this day, on account of important business.

To Mr. BARTHOLDT, for this day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HOPKINS of Pennsylvania, for this day, on account of sickness.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 6667) to require that vessels engaged in the fruit trade and plying between ports of the United States and those of Mexico and Central and South America and the West India Islands shall be manned by acclimated seamen, introduced on the 16th instant in the House and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, be referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the change of reference suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE HUDSON RIVER.

Mr. DUNPHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6448) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Companies to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KILGORE. Is this bill the regular order for this morning?

The SPEAKER. This is a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. KILGORE. It is not necessary, it seems to me, to take these measures up now out of their regular order, inasmuch as we have rules under which we can transact business. I object.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ENOCHS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing, upon a concurrent resolution relative to the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Representative Enochs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enochs to accompany the said eulogies.

The report of the Committee on Printing, recommending the passage of the resolution, was read. It stated that the estimated cost of the proposed printing is $2,625.

The resolution was agreed to.

COINAGE LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I submit another privileged report from the Committee on Printing, upon a Senate concurrent resolution for the printing of 6,000 additional copies of the Coinage Laws of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed 6,000 additional copies of the fourth edition of the document entitled "Coinage Laws of the United States, 1792 to 1894," prepared under the direction of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, with the appendix and an index to the same; of which number 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The report of the Committee on Printing, recommending the passage of the resolution, was read. It stated that the estimated cost of the proposed printing is $2,688.

The resolution was concurred in.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to submit a report on a House concurrent resolution, for the printing of a special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed a special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, on the imports for consumption and the domestic exports for the years 1881 to 1894; 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department.

The report of the Committee on Printing, recommending the passage of the resolution, was read. It stated that the estimated cost of the proposed printing is $6,500.

The resolution was agreed to.

ANNUAL REPORT OF HEALTH OFFICER, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I also submit another privileged report from the Committee on Printing, relative to the printing and binding of 1,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia for 1893.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print and bind in cloth 1,500 copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; 100 for the use of the Senate, 350 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,050 for the use of said health officer of the District.

The report of the Committee on Printing, recommending the passage of the resolution, was read. It stated that the estimated cost of the proposed printing is $653.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which each and every one of these resolutions was agreed to, and I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to reconsider the vote by which each and every one of these resolutions was agreed to, and moves to lay that motion on the table. Without objection, that motion will be entered in each case, and will be considered as laid on the table.

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE REPORTS.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded; the Clerk will call the committees for reports.

The committees were called for reports, when bills of the following titles were severally reported, read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying reports, referred to the Calendars named below, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE OVER TENNESSEE RIVER, KNOXVILLE, TENN.

By Mr. GEARY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, a bill (H. R. 7509) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee River at Knoxville, Tenn.; which was referred to the House Calendar.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER, JEFFERSON, MO.

By Mr. GEARY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, a bill (H. R. 6610) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some point within 1 mile below and 1 mile above the present limits of the city of Jefferson, Mo.; which was referred to the House Calendar.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

By Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, a bill (H. R. 6723, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 6124) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue Cutter Service; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The original bill (H. R. 6124) was ordered to lie on the table

OFFICERS OF THE NAVY TO ADMINISTER OATHS.

Mr. CUMMINGS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H R 6321) authorizing certain officers of the Navy to administer oaths; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of the committees.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BAILEY in the Chair.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills, and the Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6108) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, to facilitate business, also to be entirely fair to those who desire to speak, I would be glad if it could be done, to agree upon a length of time to be given for general debate before we begin to read the bill under the five-minute rule. If our friends upon the other side can agree upon any time, say an hour and a half——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Kentucky that when the committee rose on yesterday evening the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] was entitled to the floor; but, of course, the Chair will indulge the gentleman to reach an agreement.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. If my friend from Pennsylvania will indulge us, while we endeavor to obtain an agreement as to the length of general debate, then the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be entitled to the floor and can go on.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the debate has not yet been opened at all on that side of the House, and I should hardly feel that I was acting justly to gentlemen on the floor before it has been opened to close debate.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. As debate has not been opened, as the gentleman says, on this side, I am willing to take the responsibility of saying that this side will agree upon any fair terms for general debate, my only desire being to go on with the bill.

Mr. HITT. I do not know of any gentleman who has requested time for debate excepting the honorable gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] and Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW]; but I would rather that the gentleman should agree to defer his request for the present.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. If my colleague on the committee objects, I shall not press the matter.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, on the 12th day of January, 1893, the Queen of the Hawaiian Islands, abrogating the constitution of her Government, published in its stead one of her own formation. Two days later a committee of the citizens, doing what the representatives of the American colonies did on the 4th of July, 1776, declared that their allegiance to the Government under which they had lived was at an end. Three days later a Provisional Government was proclaimed, which the United States and all other nations having representatives there recognized as the de facto Government for the islands. That Government has continued peaceably to exist from that time to this, with the public avowal that it represents a people desirous to cast their fortunes and unite their destinies with that of the people of the United States.

In the last days of President Harrison's Administration a treaty was negotiated with that Government satisfactory to all concerned, including the trusted agents of the dethroned Queen. This treaty was submitted to the Senate, the co ordinate branch of the treaty-making power, for its consideration, the question being what political relations would be best to subsist between that people and ours. But before any opportunity for its consideration the newly inaugurated President, instead of sending a message to the Senate with his views and recommendations, assuming to be judge and jury in the case, withdrew the treaty from the Senate, leaving nothing for its consideration or upon which it could act. Then, unbeknown to the Senate, still in session, he dispatched his own commissioner, clothed with paramount authority over the duly commissioned officers of the Navy and constitutionally appointed agents of the Government. When this commissioner lands in Hawaii he finds floating peaceably there the only emblem of political power, the flag of red, white, and blue.

Without the possibility at that time of any knowledge on his part but what it was rightfully there, and without supplanting it with any other emblem of national authority, he hauls it down, and proceeds to pay his respects to the dethroned Queen, who, in violation of her official oath, had attempted to assume arbitrary, despotic power, and who, by the declaration of the President in his message to Congress, was too bloodthirsty to amnesty her revolted subjects as a condition of her own restoration to power. This was the first act of the Administration in its crusade for the resurrection of a defunct monarchy.

The next act was to send a duly appointed and commissioned agent of the United States, hat in hand, to congratulate the representatives of this newly formed Government, while concealing his secret instructions to plot with the deposed Queen a conspiracy for their overthrow. When this conspiracy was ripe for execution, this agent, in the name of the President of the United States, demands that the new-born republic abdicate its powers and, kneeling in abject submission at the foot of her restored throne, kiss the extended hand of this dusky Queen. The fitting and proper answer to the agent of such a demand would have been: Take your passport and return to your master, nevermore to set foot in Hawaii, for its soil henceforth forever is consecrated to freedom.

When African slavery, inwoven for two centuries into the very texture of society in almost half of the Republic, vanished in the expiring flames of civil war, and the martyr President, sealing with his blood the emancipation of a race, bore four millions of broken coffles to the throne of eternal justice, it was the universal thought that at last the time had come when the Goddess of Liberty could rear her altars without shuddering at the clank of the chain riveted by her professed votaries. And that henceforth, wherever on the earth's broad surface wrong should be done to bleeding humanity, every American heart would beat in sympathy, and, if powerless to do aught else, would drop a tear over the sad fate of the oppressed. In that hour of jubilation it would have been beyond the possibility of belief that the time could ever come when a Chief Magistrate of the Republic, on being clothed with full administrative powers would, almost as his first act, send the war ships and revenue cutters of the nation, with threatening guns, plowing the waste waters of a wide ocean, to remand back a liberty loving people to the despotic, half-civilized rule from which they had escaped. [Applause.]

Is it for this generation to reverse the glorious traditions of our history, and turn back the hands on the dial plate of human progress? Almost half a century ago Webster, then Secretary of State, in replying to complaints of Austria on our conduct relative to the Hungarian revolution, said in his letter to Chevalier Hülseman, "These States can not fail to cherish always a lively interest in the fortunes of nations struggling for institutions like our own." And President Fillmore, in his message to Congress on the same subject, said: "This country can not remain indifferent when the strong arm of foreign power is invoked to stifle public sentiment and repress the spirit of freedom in any country." In the first year of this Administration we have seen our own Government converted into the strong arm of foreign power to stifle the spirit of freedom in a far-off people struggling for institutions like our own, and to repress at home the sentiments of that generous patriotism which ever beats responsive to the claims of universal liberty

Another chapter in the history of our relations with foreign nations was written within the memory of most of this generation. Martin Koszta, a soldier in the Hungarian army led by

Louis Kossuth in its unsuccessful revolt against Austrian despotism, came, a friendless exile, to this country, and in its courts declared his intention to become an American citizen. Afterwards returning to Turkey and while on its territory, though contiguous to that of his former home, he was seized and carried on board an Austrian man-of-war moored in the bay of Smyrna, to be transported thence to incarceration in Austrian dungeons or to cruel death on its soil. Anchored near by was a small armed vessel with the Stars and Stripes floating at its masthead. Its commander, Capt. Ingraham, notified in person the commander of the Austrian man-of-war, on the morning it was supposed it might sail, that Martin Koszta must be set at liberty before 4 o'clock of that day, or he would open fire upon his ship and its two armed consorts.

As soon as Capt. Ingraham returned to his own vessel he ordered its decks cleared, and opening its portholes, manned its guns. But before the declining sun touched the western horizon Martin Koszta was placed on shore again a free man, though in chains. The first dispatch from our State Department sent to the American minister at Constantinople and to Capt. Ingraham was an indorsement and cordial approval of their acts. Had this Administration been in power, judging by its conduct in Hawaii, Capt. Ingraham would have been directed to look up Koszta and return him to the Austrian man-of-war, with a humble apology for his hasty act in violating the international law of kingly governments. The difference between that time and this is, William L. Marcy of the State of New York, a Democrat of the old school, was then Secretary of State, and every doubtful act or disputed fact in our intercourse with nations was construed in favor of liberty.

Now, every doubtful act or disputed fact is construed in behalf of a fallen monarchy overthrown by its liberty-loving subjects. The American people owe it to themselves, by the love they cherish for liberty and free institutions, by the gratitude they owe the fallen heroes who died "that government by the people for the people should not perish from the earth," to make this perfidy in double dealing with a friendly power; this infidelity to the spirit and genius of free institutions; this recreancy to liberty and the inalienable rights of mankind, so odious that no future servant of the great Republic will ever dare in all coming time repeat any such act.

Liberty, on trial in the forum of nations, is entitled to what every court of justice in Christendom grants to the meanest criminal at its bar, the benefit of all doubts. [Applause.] Wherever the standard of liberty is reared on the ashes of a throne, I care not how, provided it is surrounded with stout arms and brave hearts sufficient to keep it in position, it is entitled to the coöperative sympathy of every lover of universal liberty. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1134) to create the southern judicial district of the State of Texas and to fix the times and places of holding courts in said district and in the eastern and western judicial districts of said State; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6556) "to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. BRICE, and Mr. HALE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. BAILEY in the chair.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. When the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill was called up I briefly explained its provisions and endeavored to state the policy which had been pursued by the Committee on Foreign Affairs in its preparation, and I did not expect to speak again in the general debate; but my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT], in his speech on yesterday afternoon, and the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. GROW], have spoken on subjects outside of the bill, and so have made it perhaps proper that I should again briefly address the committee.

I have listened with pleasure to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] in the first address that I have had an opportunity to hear him deliver in this House since his late election, and I was glad to have the pleasure of hearing his views on the subject on which he spoke. But, Mr. Chairman, the Hawaiian question is regarded by me as res adjudicata.

When the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania was perhaps making his canvass in that State the Hawaiian question was considered and discussed in the House of Representatives for five days, and during the heat of his canvass it may have escaped the attention of my distinguished friend. I shall simply dismiss that subject now by reading for his benefit the action of the House of Representatives when that question was under consideration. The House adopted by a majority of 99 the resolutions which I now read:

Resolved, first. That it is the sense of this House that the action of the United States minister in employing United States naval forces and illegally aiding in overthrowing the constitutional Government of the Hawaiian Islands in January, 1893, and in setting up in its place a Provisional Government not republican in form and in opposition to the will of a majority of the people, was contrary to the traditions of our Republic and the spirit of our Constitution, and should be and is condemned.

Second. That we heartily approve the principle announced by the President of the United States, that interference with the domestic affairs of an independent nation is contrary to the spirit of American institutions. And it is further the sense of this House that the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to our country, or the assumption of a protectorate over them by our Government, is uncalled for and inexpedient; that the people of that country should have absolute freedom and independence in pursuing their own line of policy, and that foreign intervention in the political affairs of the islands will not be regarded with indifference by the Government of the United States.

That is all I desire to say on the Hawaiian question.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] in his speech on yesterday traveled far outside of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. The first point made by him was that he objected to that provision in the bill which appropriates only $150,000 "for contingent expenses of United States consulates." And the gentleman seemed very regretful that we had not appropriated for that purpose $200,000. I call his attention to the fact that he was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for two years in the Fifty-first Congress: and the answer to his statement is, that if he believed there should be $200,000 appropriated for contingent expenses of our consulates, he should at that time have brought in a bill to that effect. The Congress of the United States has for many years been appropriating but $150,000 in each appropriation bill for contingent expenses of United States consulates. The amount has never exceeded $150,000; and I do not understand where the necessity is now for raising the appropriation to $200,000.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Does the gentleman think that $150,000 is enough?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I do. It has been the amount appropriated each year for years.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Does not the gentleman think there will have to be a deficiency appropriation of at least $50,000?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I do not.

Mr. HITT. I would like to remind the gentleman that last year the present Secretary of State, who was making strenuous efforts at economy, and who did reduce the contingent expenses for consulates a good many thousand dollars, was still forced to expend $196,000 for this purpose; and he stated——

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I do not think it will be necessary to expend more than $150,000 for this purpose during the next fiscal year; I hope this appropriation will be sufficient.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall not dwell on the point made by my friend from Illinois in favor of increasing the amount to be allowed for contingent expenses of consulates, when in all the years of the past we have found $150,000 enough, and when the distinguished gentleman from Illinois himself, while chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for two years, believed this sum enough and reported only $150,000 each year.

The next point to which I desire to call the attention of the House is that the gentleman from Illinois, in a most lugubrious manner, referred——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I prefer not to be interrupted at this time.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] referred in a most lugubrious manner to the action of the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Quincy. There is always a wail of sorrow that goes up from Republicans when Republicans are turned out of office and Democrats put in. If I had the power I would increase that wail of sorrow, because I believe that the party in power, whether it be the Democratic or the Republican party, should be represented in all the offices by the men who reflect the views of the dominant party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman permit me a single remark, for I know he would not misrepresent me? I made no criticism myself as a Republican upon the gentleman named; I merely cited two eminent Democrats who criticised him.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I come to the gentleman's statement. He said yesterday in his speech that Mr. Quincy came to Washington with a newspaper announcement of his character which attracted his attention: and he read that newspaper announcement, and then the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr HITT] said:

"Mr. Quincy has been allowed a debauch among the consulships He has sent out to look after our trade in the uttermost ends of the earth the usual quota of broken-down men and ignorant editors.

When the gentleman said "the usual quota of broken-down men and ignorant editors" he criticises appointments made by Republican administrations. I am surprised.

Mr. HITT. I read those words from the New York Evening Post, the great and intelligent organ of the Democracy of that State. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If the gentleman will read what he said on yesterday, he will find that those words are not taken from the New York Post.

Mr. HITT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Those are the words I quoted and read from that paper.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Well, it is not so printed here. But whether the gentleman read from the New York Post or any other paper is immaterial for the purpose now in hand. The gentleman desired to bring the administration of Mr. Quincy, as Assistant Secretary of State, into disrepute, and I desire to say here that Mr. Quincy, as Assistant Secretary of State, discharged his duty faithfully and efficiently; that he stands before the people of Massachusetts and before the people of the United States as a man honorable, able, and efficient in the discharge of his duty.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WARNER. With the assent of the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Chairman, I beg his permission to correct what I believe to be an act of injustice done by him to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], for upon hearing the gentleman from Illinois on yesterday I understood, and I am sure that everybody on this side at least understood, that the remarks of the gentleman to the effect that Mr. Quincy had sent out to look after our trade in the uttermost ends of the earth "the usual crowd of broken-down politicians and ignorant editors" was not intended so much as a partisan attack upon the present Democratic Administration as it was a reference to the usual practices which prevailed under the Administration just preceding it——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. WARNER (continuing). And the gentleman from Kentucky, instead of criticising the gentleman from Illinois, ought, it seems to me, to have complimented him upon the frankness and candor of the admission thus involved. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, if the gentleman from Kentucky will allow me——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I think I must decline to be interrupted further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky declines to be interrupted.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], having I believe once been an Assistant Secretary in the State Department, knows well what kind of consuls were appointed at the time that he was connected with the State Department. He knows what class of men were appointed during the years the Republican party had power to appoint the consuls in our foreign service.

He had many opportunities, as a member of Congress for more than ten years while his party was in power, and for a part of which time he was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to correct the errors of the consular service. He was the chairman of the committee which had charge of the matter, and if he had regarded the consular service as inefficient, if he believed that there were changes that should have been made, he had an opportunity to attempt to correct them, and had also the experience, learning, and ability which he had acquired in connection with that service as an officer in the State Department.

I think there is no doubt that the appointees since the new Administration came in will compare very favorably with those who were engaged in the same service under the preceding Administration. But I must differ with some gentlemen who have been writing in the newspapers and magazines upon this subject.

I have studied the consular service for ten years. I had an opportunity of traveling over Europe, and so far as I met the consuls appointed under a Republican Administration and so far as I met those appointed under a Democratic Administration, I found them good men, faithfully and efficiently discharging their duties.

I have said, and the distinguished gentleman from Illinois on yesterday referred to it, that I believe there should be a revision of the laws regulating the consular service. It has been many years since the present law was enacted. It was made, I believe, in 1856, and amended very often since that date. A commission should be appointed, composed of gentlemen who have given thorough study and consideration to the subject, and those gentlemen should prepare a bill revising the whole system—regulating salaries; regulating the duties; regulating the list of consulates.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] yesterday referred to an appointment that had been made in the diplomatic service. It seemed to grieve the gentleman from Illinois very much that the President of the United States should have nominated Mr. Van Alen for ambassador to Italy. No man has ever yet questioned the fact that Mr. Van Alen was, in education, in experience, in Democracy, a man that was suitable for the position of ambassador to Italy. When his name was sent to the Senate of the United States it was promptly confirmed by Republicans and Democrats. But the gentleman from Illinois says that there was a charge alleged against him that he had contributed to the campaign fund, and on that account should not have been nominated.

Mr. HITT. I did not say that there was a charge of that kind. I simply stated that it was an admission or statement of Mr. Van Alen himself.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Van Alen denied, and so did Mr. Whitney and other members of the Democratic National Committee, that he ever contributed one dollar under an agreement or with the expectation of receiving an appointment in the diplomatic service, or receiving any other appointment.

Mr. HITT. They did not deny the payment.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Van Alen may have contributed a certain amount of money to the campaign fund, and if you will find me among the Republicans that are able to do so a man who does not contribute when the time comes, as some of your distinguished men have said, when "the fat should be fried out of them" in order to carry on the canvass, then I will find you a Republican whom you will not honor often with office.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Van Alen was an honorable, high-toned gentleman, who believed, as did the able and patriotic President who nominated him to the Senate, that "a public office is a public trust;" and when the Senate of the United States confirmed him he declined to accept an office that had a taint of suspicion, in the breast even of a Republican, that anything improper had been done.

Now, let us compare Mr. Van Alen with a Republican officer. I shall not refer to all the methods that have been used by Republicans in elections in the various States of the United States. I simply desire to place in contrast with Mr. Van Alen the name of John Wanamaker, Postmaster-General under the late Republican Administration.

I have nothing to say against Mr. Wanamaker as a citizen and a merchant, but I do say that up to the time he was made Postmaster-General he was not known as a leader in the Republican party; he had never made himself conspicuous either for intelligence or patriotism. He was not a prominent Republican. He had never been honored with any office by his party in the State of Pennsylvania. He never came into notice until the papers all over this country published him as a man who had raised $400,000 as a campaign fund, or a corruption fund, to be used to elect Mr. Harrison. And when the election was over, and it was mentioned in the papers that he would be tendered the position of Postmaster-General, it was believed by many that the taint of suspicion, the notoriety he had acquired as a man who had furnished $400,000 to elect President Harrison, would prevent him from accepting the position of a Cabinet officer. He had never been spoken of as Cabinet material up to that time, and yet we find, in contrast to the way in which Mr. Van Alen acted, that John Wanamaker accepted the office of Postmaster-General, and held the office for four years. But this is not all. He not only accepted the office, but the office was made the means of advertising the clothing house of John Wanamaker all over the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I preferred to confine the debate to the pending bill, but it is not my fault that the debate has taken a wide range.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Was not the resignation of Mr. Van Alen a confession of the truth of the charges against him?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. It was not. It was not a resignation, but a declination. The declination of Mr. Van Alen was one of the highest evidences of that honor and of that gentility which should characterize a gentleman who desires to go into office, if he goes at all, with his record unsullied.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], referred to another subject, which I desire briefly to discuss. It has been said by some that our consular service can be benefited and improved by putting it under the civil-service law. I am opposed to placing our consular system under civil-service rules. The most suitable persons for the consular service can not be selected under civil-service rules, in my opinion. There are elements which go to make up a good consular officer which could not be ascertained and determined by a civil-service examination. We should not inaugurate a consular aristocracy to hold office for life. We want no permanent class of consuls representing our country in the various commercial cities of the world. We want no permanent class of officers residing permanently abroad and giving up entirely their interest in our people, our business, and our Government.

The representatives of our Government, whether they be diplomats or consuls, should belong to the political party which at that time is dominant in our country. Our consular service would be rendered very unpopular if placed under the civil service rules, and the success of the system would be greatly endangered. Nearly forty years have passed since the present general law on "consuls and the consular service" was enacted. A commission should be appointed to revise these laws, and in this manner I believe our consular system could be improved.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend from Kentucky has remarked that he thought the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] had wandered from the propriety of this debate by talking about one of the appointments of the President to a foreign mission; and I suppose that, probably thinking that two wrongs make a right, he at once retorts by attacking a Cabinet officer of the former Administration. I am placed in the awkward position of knowing and respecting both these gentlemen; but when men are in public life and occupy public positions their records and their fitness for the positions to which they are appointed become fair subjects of criticism.

Mr. Wanamaker has been accused by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs with raising money, instead of giving it personally, like Mr. Van Alen, and on that account he was appointed to the honorable position which he held.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I desire to interrupt my friend at that point. I know that he does not desire to do me an injustice. I say that was said of him, and published in the papers.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Very well, sir; the gentleman from Kentucky says that it was said of Mr. Wanamaker and published in the newspapers, and I accept his amended statement. Mr. Wanamaker did what any citizen of the United States has the right to do, when he sees that the doctrines and the policy of the opposite political party threaten not only his individual business, but all the industries of the entire State of which he has the honor to be a citizen, and when he sees that, owing to the practice of the opposite party, who encourage rich men to give contributions in order to get honorable social positions abroad, he goes forth to the manufacturers and business men of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and with perfect propriety asks for subscriptions to neutralize those presenting contributions for the sake of obtaining social distinction.

That is what Mr. Wanamaker did, and that is what he deserves credit for; and there never was a suggestion that it was done for any other purpose than to defend the great doctrine of protection to American industries. After the victory of the Republican party on that principle, the President of the United States elect looked around for a fitting person to occupy a most honorable position in the Government. He did as other Presidents had done; he looked among the business men who had proved by their ability, and especially by the characteristic for which Mr. Wanamaker is particularly distinguished—executive ability—their fitness for the position. Mr. Wanamaker had controlled the largest retail mercantile establishment in the United States, and in that business had employed a greater number of persons than are employed in any other similar place of business in the country, and he had conducted that great establishment with conspicuous success.

Was it any wonder, then, that President Harrison, exercising that judgment for which he is known throughout the length and breadth of this land, should have turned to Philadelphia and called her leading merchant to fill the position of Postmaster-General, a position requiring the highest executive ability? And, Mr. Chairman, that was the reason that John Wanamaker was called here and made Postmaster-General of these United States, and not because he had seen fit as a citizen to raise subscriptions for the campaign fund. His success in the office justified his selection.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have already said, I am placed in the awkward position of being compelled to draw a comparison between this case and that of Mr. Van Alen. Mr. Van Alen was absolutely unknown, except socially. Mr. Van Alen was compelled to admit that he had never voted. It was not until he saw a chance to improve his social position that he sought that honorable appointment.

Our diplomatic service suffers enough from political appointments in recognition of party services, without such appointments being made simply for social reasons. When the wagons of John Wanamaker were traveling through the streets of Philadelphia supplying good to his customers, Mr. Van Alen was "tooling" his four-in-hand and his tandem down Bellevue avenue in Newport. [Laughter.] When Mr. Wanamaker was doing everything he could by his personal exertions to advance the public interests of the State of Pennsylvania, Mr. Van Alen was living in England and educating his sons at foreign colleges. When Mr. Wanamaker was laboring for advancement of public and private morality in his native State, Mr. Van Alen was fooling away his time in social life and building a house in Newport where he burnt candles and refused to introduce gas, because candles were "so English, you know." [Laughter and applause.]

So, Mr. Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, you took an unfortunate step when you undertook to make a comparison between John Wanamaker, a man of the people, and Mr. Van Alen, an aristocrat of the aristocrats. And, Mr. Chairman, it is a curious anomaly that the party which bears the name of Democrat, which calls itself Democratic, should choose to champion an aristocrat, while the Republican party stands by the man of the people. This debate has wandered, but it is necessary that it should do so when comparisons are drawn between the appointments to office of the Republican party and the appointments of the Democratic party. It is necessary, when such comparisons are made, that the facts shall be plainly and baldly stated, that they may go forth to the people and let them decide which party is the more careful, the more wise, the more judicious in its selection of public officers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I remarked on yesterday after my friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] had concluded his speech that it had not been my purpose to say anything in reference to this bill. It is the bill making the usual and customary appropriations for the support of our representatives abroad, diplomatic and consular. I do not know that the honorable gentleman from Illinois objected to any but a single clause in the bill, the appropriation for contingent expenses of the consulates, which he complained had been cut down from $200,000 recommended by the Secretary of State, to $150,000. That was the only criticism, the only objection, that my honorable friend made, and I do not suppose that he has any other. This bill has been reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the support of our representatives in foreign ports, and of our consular system, connected with our commercial relations with all the countries of the world.

This diplomatic and consular service, Mr. Chairman, is a matter that has recommended itself to our Government from the time when our first representative was sent abroad to the courts of Europe, and if the service has not grown into a methodical and regular system, as the gentleman from Illinois says it has not, it has at least given us a representative at the capital of every organized government throughout the world; and, so far as being a system which can be challenged for inefficiency, I think it may be said to be so efficient that it gives ample protection to our citizens wherever they go, and wherever our flag floats. In addition to that it gives to our commerce with all countries of the world that protection which is afforded by the residence of our American consuls.

Our consular system has increased our commerce with all the nations of the earth, and more especially has it increased our commerce with those countries in Central and South America that lie so contiguous to us, and are united to us not only by the ties which bind together peoples who live under practically the same form of government, but also by the bonds of trade and commerce. I do not think, therefore, that my honorable friend from Illinois, who is usually so fair and just and conservative, selected wisely the bill upon which to make a political speech, and I was somewhat surprised when he undertook to cite as an instance of the power and the policy of the English nation the fact that in far-off Abyssinia, when a British consul and British subjects had been imprisoned, an army of 32,000 men had been gathered together and sent there to protect them. My honorable friend might have found a more relevant instance of action on the part of the British Government, that government which gives protection to its citizens wherever they go and into whatever foreign land commerce or trade or pleasure may call them—he might, I say, have found a much more pertinent illustration of the foreign policy of that government in its action in 184 in reference to these very Hawaiian Islands to which my friend referred in terms commending our representative there under a former Administration and condemning the policy of the present Administration. In 1843 the regular British consul at the Hawaiian Islands had left the consulate and had appointed a man to act in his stead. This consul had litigation with the subjects of the Hawaiian Government, and being unwilling to await the tardy operation of the courts, he appealed to Lord George Paulet, commanding a British cruiser on the Hawaiian coast, to come to his aid, and the commander did so, and hauled down the Hawaiian flag and hoisted the British flag.

When that action was made known in England, and when the commander of the Pacific coast squadron was informed of it, he sailed into the port of Honolulu and required Sir George Paulet to go on shore, haul down the British flag, and hoist again at every point the Hawaiian flag. And, Mr. Chairman, it was an honor to that great nation from which we borrow our language and most of our laws, it was a credit to that great power that, instead of availing itself of the improper action of one of its officers, it rebuked that action, as the admiral of the squadron did rebuke it by requiring Sir George Paulet to haul down the British flag and to hoist again the Hawaiian flag and salute it.

That, Mr. Chairman, was an instance that might fitly have been referred to by my honorable friend from Illinois as illustrative of the disposition of the Government of Great Britain, while protecting every British citizen in all his rights, to do justice, and especially to do justice to a weaker nation. That action, however, was in full keeping with the policy which we had adopted towards those islands, for in the early history of this country, while Daniel Webster was Secretary of State, he wrote a letter upon the subject of the attitude of the United States toward the Hawaiian Islands. I will embody that letter in my remarks.

Mr. HITT. Is that the Hulseman letter?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. No, sir; this is a letter in reference to Hawaiian matters. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 28, 1843.

SIR: The course adopted by this Government in regard to the Sandwich Islands has for its sole object the preservation of the independence of those islands and the maintenance by their Government of an entire impartiality in their intercourse with foreign states. The United States desire to exercise no undue influence or control over the government of the islands, nor to obtain from it any grant of exclusive privileges whatever. This was solemnly declared in the President's message to Congress, and it is declared also in the instructions given to Mr. Brown, of which you will receive herewith a copy.

The President would exceedingly regret that suspicion of a sinister purpose of any kind on the part of the United States should prevent England and France from adopting the same specific, just, and conservative course towards the Government and people of this remote, but interesting group of islands.

I am, sir, etc.,

DAN'L WEBSTER.

EDWARD EVERETT, Esq., etc.

This was addressed to our minister at London, Mr. Edward Everett; and Mr. Everett, at the suggestion of Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, brought about a meeting between the French minister at London and the English minister, which finally led to an agreement, which I will read:

Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of the French, taking into consideration the existence in the Sandwich Islands of a government capable of providing for the regularity of its relations with foreign nations, have thought it right to engage, reciprocally, to consider the Sandwich Islands as an independent state, and never to take possession, either directly or under the title of protectorate, or under any other form, of any part of the territory of which they are composed.

The undersigned, Her Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs and the ambassador extraordinary of His Majesty the King of the French at the court of London, being furnished with the necessary powers, hereby declare in consequence that their said majesties take reciprocally that engagement.

In witness whereof the undersigned have signed the present declaration, and have affixed thereto the seal of their arms.

Done in duplicate at London, the 28th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1843.

[L. S.] ABERDEEN.
[L. S.] ST. AULAIRE.

So it will be seen that the course pursued by Mr. Webster, as Secretary of State, resulted in this agreement to which we are a party. Now, my distinguished friend enters into high laudation of the acts of Minister Stevens, and says that our Government ought to have sustained him, and that it is ignominious and cowardly not to sustain your minister abroad when he is assailed. Who first assailed Minister Stevens? Whence did he receive his first rebuke? It was from the Secretary of State under the Harrison Administration, Mr. Foster. Mr. Stevens had written to Mr. Foster under date of January 18, 1893:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Honolulu, January 18, 1893 (via San Francisco).

Events in Hawaii in the past few days have moved rapidly. An entire overthrow of the Hawaiian monarchy, and the establishment of a provisional government in the interest of the whole people of the islands, without the sacrifice of a single life.

The new Government is in full possession of the islands, and was promptly recognized by all the diplomatic representatives. The four men of whom it is composed are of high character, one of whom resigned his position as one of the supreme judges to assume the place. Full dispatches by the mail leaving Honolulu to-day by special steamer.

STEVENS, United States Minister.

What was the reply of Mr. Foster, the then Secretary of State? I read his reply. It was this:

The phraseology of your proclamation in announcing your action of the assumption of protection of the Hawaiian Islands in the name of the United States would appear to be tantamount to an assumption of a protectorate over those islands in behalf of the United States, with all the rights and obligations which the term implies. To this extent it goes beyond the necessities of the situation and the instructions heretofore given you.

Now, where does Mr. Stevens stand by the declaration of the Harrison Administration? He stands where he ought to stand, condemned by the letter of Mr. Webster, condemned by the action of Mr. Everett, condemned by the agreement which I have cited, and condemned by the enlightened sentiment of America without reference to politics. He had assumed to send a treaty here, and the honorable gentleman from Illinois says that treaty was one that ought to have been accepted, and he reflects upon the President of the United States for withdrawing it from the Senate. What did that treaty propose? It proposed that the whole debt of the Hawaiian Government, amounting to over $3,000,000, should be assumed as a preliminary step.

It proposed that the Queen should be given an annuity and that the heir of the Queen, residing in England, should be provided for by an annual stipend. That was the treaty which was sent by Mr. Harrison to the Senate of the United States; and those were the conditions under which it was to be considered. The present President of the United States, when he came into office, finding that to be the condition of affairs, proposed to act at least with as much justice as England had done when her officer had assumed improper control; and he withdrew that treaty from the consideration of the Senate and refused to submit it afterward.

I venture to assert that there is not an enlightened, well informed man on either side of this Chamber who will deny that the rebuke of Secretary Foster, the Republican Secretary of State, was well deserved by Mr. Stevens, and that the action of the present President of the United States was right in withdrawing a treaty which proposed under the flag of the United States to perpetrate this outrage upon a weak and friendly power.

Not only that; but subsequently to that action, it was said, this was a bloodless revolution and had been achieved without the loss of a life. But it seemed to have been a very ineffectual one for the purpose of giving security to the people of the Hawaiian Islands; for long afterward Mr. Stevens wrote a letter at the instance of this Provisional Government to the officer commanding one of our cruisers of the Pacific squadron in Honolulu Sound, asking him to hoist the American flag in order that he might give stability to this Government.

When the President of the United States sent, as he had a right to do, his commissioner there, and he found the flag of the United States flying over those Hawaiian Islands at Honolulu, he directed the flag to be hauled down and that the marines be returned to the vessel to which they belonged. This was done. Was it wrong? What right had they to exist under the flag of the United States? And the President was careful to say that he remitted the consideration of that question to the Congress of the United States, where it belonged. Was it not a proper act, therefore, to endeavor to restore the condition of affairs when Mr. Stevens had so far exceeded his official authority that the Republican Secretary of State had to rebuke him for what he did? Was Mr. Foster right or was Mr. Foster wrong?

The truth is that Mr. Stevens had landed the troops to effect the revolution. The truth (and it can not be concealed) is that Mr. Stevens hoisted the American flag over the islands of Hawaii some fifteen or twenty days after this peaceful revolution had been accomplished—showing that it was accomplished alone by the presence of the troops of the United States—showing that law and order could be maintained alone by the hoisting of our flag. If England, that great territory-acquiring country, whose flag floats over the world, could afford to rebuke her own officer and haul down her flag and hoist the Hawaiian flag as it was her duty to do under the solemn agreement she had made with France and the United States, was it not equally the duty of the United States to say that the flag of our country should not be desecrated by being used to take possession of property which belonged to a friendly power? And was it not the duty of our minister to restore those marines to the vessel to which they belonged?

Now, when was this quasi-military occupation of the Hawaiian Islands to be abandoned? When did they intend that this protectorate thus established should cease? I say that my honorable friend from Illinois has undertaken to discuss a subject which this House settled by its resolution passed sometime ago; and I had hoped that this matter would not be heard of again. In the discussion, however, of this bill he seems to think it necessary that the question should be reopened.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Is it still the purpose of the Administration to restore the Queen to the throne of the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I imagine not. I have had no conversation with the Administration on this subject. I am simply speaking here from general knowledge.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. What, then, is the point of the gentleman's argument?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I think it very likely the President is going to leave you and the other members of Congress to determine this question. You have determined it. The thing has been settled: the vote has been taken, so far as this House is concerned: and it seems to me my honorable friend from Illinois ought to have regarded this as a settled matter and ought not to have reopened it here. But as he has reopened it, justice to the Administration, justice to our duty as a friendly power toward a weak government with which we were connected, demands that I should make this vindication of the action of the Administration.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Can my colleague on the committee tell us just when the Administration changed its mind in regard to restoring the Queen to the throne?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. In regard to the mind of the Administration I do not know anything more than the gentleman does, except from what has occurred. Everything has been published. Every instruction to the minister who was sent out there—Mr. Blount—has been acted on; and the present minister is now acting under the instructions of the Administration; and I take it for granted we shall leave to the people of Hawaii the right to work out their own salvation. And that is the position the President took in his message which he sent to the House and which the House acted on in determining this question.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Will my colleague on the committee be willing to leave this Provisional Government in absolute and undisturbed possession of the country which it acquired by a conspiracy on the part of an American minister and that was sustained by American soldiers?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I do not think it ought to be. Would you be willing that it should so continue?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. No; but I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Well, you are a member of Congress. You had a right as a member of Congress to decide the question. It was so decided by a vote of this House.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I know. It is not true, however, that that was the case.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Ah! Well, perhaps you are one of the parties who are responsible to some extent for the condition that prevails. But I say the matter has been determined by a vote of this House and ought to remain determined.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to say just this——

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I must decline to be interrupted.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I wish to say to the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi says he declines to be interrupted.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I have yielded, Mr. Chairman, as much as I can yield to interruptions.

There is another matter which my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] referred to, which is also equally inexplicable, and which has no relevancy to the question under consideration. I allude to that part of the remarks of my distinguished friend which referred to a certain foreign appointment made by the President of the United States in the early part of his Administration. The gentleman alluded to the appointment of a distinguished citizen of the State of Rhode Island by the name of James J. Van Alen.

I venture to assert that there is not a member on the floor of this House from the State of Rhode Island, whether he be a Democrat or Republican, that would not agree with some other very distinguished Republicans on the other side that Mr. Van Alen is one of the most accomplished men in the State of Rhode Island; and so far from deserving to be condemned and depicted in the language used by my eloquent friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] as simply a man of fashion and without brains, he is regarded by two such men as Senator ALDRICH of Rhode Island and Mr. Stoddart, who, I understand, is a leading manufacturer of Rhode Island, as a man of a high order of ability and most eminently qualified to represent this Government in the important capacity to which he had been assigned. And there are no two men in that State who can speak from a better and more thorough knowledge of the facts than these two gentlemen.

So far as his fitness for the position is concerned, we have first the action of the President of the United States in making the appointment, and the further affirmation of his fitness for the position by the fact that he was immediately confirmed by the Senate of the United States. These recommendations are usually considered in our country as being perfectly good ones for any man. And I have not heard of anybody in this country who has exhibited more delicacy of feeling, more indisposition to take official position with even a suspicion of wrong than he; because in the face of his appointment and confirmation, when these reports grew up, that he had been a subscriber to the election fund of the Democratic party, he promptly declined to accept the foreign mission, although it was then in his hand. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There are not many evidences given by the party to which my honorable friend from Illinois belongs, and of which he is such a great ornament, of indisposition to accept office under any circumstances. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in regard to this matter that I do not know Mr. Van Alen personally. But I do know what commended him to the attention of the President of the United States. I do know that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] has associated his name with a distinguished gentleman from New York, that of William C. Whitney. Now, Mr. Whitney says—or he virtually says so—that these contributions, whatever they were—he did not say what—were made as honestly as any contributions which were ever made, without a word or syllable or thought, as expressed by any acts or utterances of these parties that the contribution was made with reference to any official position or for political preferment. If there is a man in this country who stands so high that the foul breath of calumny may not hurt him, that calumny which, as the great poet of nature says:

> The whitest virtue strikes,
> Maids, matrons, nay, the very secrets of the grave it penetrates.

I say if there is a man who has lived a life of such purity, such integrity, such honor, such fidelity to the great trusts conferred upon him and the important trust which the President of the United States, Mr. Cleveland, reposed in him when he put him at the head of the Navy of the United States, that man is Mr. William C. Whitney, of New York. It will not do, Mr. Chairman, for anybody from New York, whether he be a Democrat or Republican, to give utterance to the expression that Mr. William C. Whitney could be approached by anyone and offered a bribe for any purpose or for any position.

This calumny falls of its own weight. The life of honesty, purity, and uprightness which he has led, clothes him in an armor which the poisoned arrow can not penetrate, but falls harmless at his feet. There is no man in this country who has held the position of Secretary of the Navy, who left it with a higher character than did William C. Whitney; and if contributions were made by Mr. Van Alen, or anybody else, they were made freely and voluntarily, without the expectation of reward. No man would have approached William C. Whitney and said, "I want to subscribe to this fund with the hope that I may get an office." As Mr. Whitney says in his own letter, it would not only have been dishonoring to Mr. Van Alen and dishonoring to Mr. Whitney, but with that lofty sense of right which always distinguished him, Mr. Whitney says it would be infamous. And do you not think so? Is there any man whose partisan coloring so dyes his mind that he would be willing to asperse the character of an honest and upright citizen and officer in order to secure political advantage?

Now, it has been alluded to by more gentlemen than one that a distinguished gentleman of a former Administration was a large contributor to the fund that elected Mr. Harrison. These funds are the sinews of war which you used pretty savagely, both parties, in your great cities. I thank God that in my own country we have a population so far above the reach of money that I have never heard the accusation made against any man, from governor down, that he used a dollar in his canvass that was not properly used. That is the character of the people we have there. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But in your large cities at the North both parties use money.

Mr. Wanamaker was said to have made liberal contributions to the fund which elected Mr. Harrison, under whose Administration he was appointed to a Cabinet office. But I have not the knowledge upon which to predicate the assertion, nor have I the temper or the disposition to say that Mr. Wanamaker was appointed by President Harrison because he was a liberal subscriber to the fund. I would scorn to say it, for I am not possessed of facts which would justify me in saying it. Neither is the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] possessed of facts which authorized him to say anything to the discredit of a man who occupies so high and lofty a position as William C. Whitney.

It is the privilege of men to give. Some men are rich and some men are poor. I belong to the latter class: but I have no envy of the man whose industry and energy have made him a wealthy man. I have not that spirit of demagogy, the meanest of all demagogy, which would excite compassion for the poor by arousing hostility toward the wealthy. I have no temper of that sort, and therefore I would not be heard here on this floor to say a word that would look to the impeachment of Mr. Wanamaker, and less still have I a word to say which would look to the impeachment of the honorable President who placed him in the Cabinet position which he held. And while I would not say it of the opposition, I will not allow them to say it of Mr. Whitney, or of the present President of the United States, without resenting it in the proper spirit in which it ought to be resented.

What interest had the present President of the United States in the Hawaiian Islands to support one party or another? What interest had he in displacing one government and establishing another? He delivered, and this House delivered, a deserved rebuke to Mr. Stevens, and John W. Foster delivered a deserved rebuke to Mr. Stevens, for exceeding his power and violating his instructions; and that is the sort of a minister that my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] would eulogize and deify as if he was entitled, whatever he might do, under all circumstances to receive the protection and support of the Government. I say, what interest had Mr. Cleveland, the present President of the United States, to do otherwise than was right and just and equitable and fair?

Why, my honored friend, a former Speaker of the House, Mr. GROW, who has come back amongst us now in the vigor of his advanced years to teach us lessons of wisdom that come from his experience, spoke of the fact that we had not treated this minister rightly, that he ought to have been protected and supported. The gentleman criticised the action of Mr. Cleveland for withdrawing that odious treaty of annexation. Did he criticise him rightly? I appeal to every fair-minded man whether Mr. Cleveland did not do right, and whether he had any other motive than simply doing what was right in adjusting this matter which Mr. Stevens had involved in all this trouble by the improper use of the forces of the Government, and the improper use of the flag which represented the Government.

But before I proceed further I want to have read, as a part of my remarks, in reference to the asperson of Mr. Whitney and the aspersion of Mr. Van Alen, a letter from Mr. Whitney, and the interview which accompanies it, which I think settles this question beyond all controversy.

VAN ALEN'S APPOINTMENT—WILLIAM C. WHITNEY EXPLAINS HIS CONNECTION WITH IT—HE RESENTS THE IMPUTATION THAT HE HAS CONDUCTED A BARGAIN OF OFFICE FOR MONEY—HIS ATTITUDE PROPERLY SET FORTH IN THE SUN, WHOSE ARTICLE THE EX-SECRETARY FORWARDED TO PRESIDENT CLEVELAND.

Mr. William C. Whitney made public yesterday the following letter, a copy of which was sent to the New York World:

"To the editor of the World:

"SIR: If I alone were concerned I should pay no attention to the slanderous matter contained in your issue of yesterday headed 'Van Alen's bargain.' So far as I personally am concerned, anyone who chooses to think me capable of bargaining an office for a political contribution is welcome to their opinion. Having lived a good part of my life in public affairs, I am certain that no one for whose opinion I have the least regard would entertain the thought for a moment. But there is much more than my personality in this matter; Mr. Van Alen has been set upon and caricatured and libeled in every way. I propose to relieve him from blame so far as I have had relations with him.

"Let us see just what the allegation is: The President 'was disgusted with the idea of appointing Mr. Van Alen, and he tried to avoid it. On the other hand, he had Mr. Whitney's promise to Mr. Van Alen to favor. Mr. Whitney told the President of his promise and urged its fulfillment. * * * Mr. Van Alen had been promised the Italian mission in return for his contribution of $50,000 to the campaign fund.'

"The allegation is specific enough, and imputes to us a most dishonorable transaction. What is the truth? I have had nothing to do with Mr. Van Alen's candidacy, except what is contained in a communication to the President, which I shall ask you to print, together with the interview to which it refers. With the President, personally, I have never exchanged a word on the subject. The letter and the interview contain a complete answer to the allegations:

"'NEW YORK, June 20, 1893.

"'DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I inclose a clipping from the New York Sun, which covers what purports to be an interview with me regarding the candidacy of Mr. Van Alen for the mission to Italy. The interview is substantially correct.

"'I think in justice to Mr. Van Alen I ought to say more. With the main facts as stated in this interview you should be familiar. I made it clear to everybody in the campaign that I would assume no obligations, tacit or expressed, as to offices or appointments, and you are quite aware that you have not been asked to perform any contracts of this nature so far as I know.

"'Mr. Van Alen is a gentleman, and gave what he contributed freely and from an interest in the success of the party. He had previously identified himself warmly with the party in Rhode Island; his candidacy has the support of nearly every prominent party man in his State. I have been called upon by these men to see that his warm support of our party should not militate against his candidacy.

"'I therefore break the silence which I have heretofore maintained since the inauguration to say that I know Mr. Van Alen well, and that he is, in my judgment, in every way adapted to the position which he seeks, and that I sincerely hope that the malicious stories which have found their way into print will not affect him adversely.

"'There is no obligation upon you to appoint him to any office; but there is the additional reason for appointing him that, as the result of a very patriotic, generous, and cordial support of the party in the last campaign, when friends were few and calls were great, he has been accused of dishonorable bargaining.

"'This, as you know, is the first time you have been approached by me on the subject of appointments.

"'Very sincerely, yours,

"'W. C. WHITNEY.

"'To the Hon. GROVER CLEVELAND,
"'Washington, D. C.'"

The interview referred to in the letter was as follows:

"The Hon. William C. Whitney was asked at his home, 2 West Fifty-seventh street, last evening by a Sun reporter about a dispatch which quoted the gossip of Washington to the effect that while in charge of the Democratic campaign last fall he promised the place of minister to Rome to Mr. J. J. Van Alen, of New York, in return for campaign contributions made by Mr. Van Alen, amounting to $50,000. The dispatch further said that Mr. Van Alen's first contribution was $30,000, and that later, upon being encouraged to believe that his ambition to be sent to Rome would be gratified, he increased his campaign contribution by $20,000, and then had no doubt whatever that his name would be one of the first diplomatic nominations to be sent to the Senate. The dispatch went on to say that the weeks went by without any indication that Mr. Van Alen was to realize upon his campaign investment, and then came the reports of the falling out between the President and Mr. Whitney, followed by the alleged statement of Mr. Cleveland that he 'has learned to distrust Mr. Whitney and his tricks.'

"Mr. Whitney read the dispatch carefully, and, as he returned it to a reporter, said, with more than usual emphasis:

"'Nonsense: nonsense.'

"Mr. Whitney usually speaks in rather softly modulated tones. He is not an excitable citizen. But this time he spoke in emphatic tones. He continued:

"'Mr. Van Alen contributed to the campaign fund; but, of course, I am not at liberty to state the amount any more than I would be at liberty to tell what other gentlemen gave. I can say, though, that Mr. Van Alen did not contribute either of the amounts named in the dispatch. At the time he contributed there was no conversation whatever between Mr. Van Alen and myself to the effect that he was to have the place of minister to Rome or any other office. Do you suppose that any gentleman would contribute with the idea that he was to have a place in return? The subject was never mentioned by Mr. Van Alen or myself. I will go further and make it as strong as possible when I say that I made no contracts for office, express or implied, during the campaign either in Mr. Cleveland's name or anybody else's name. I made no contracts with anybody. Can I make it plainer than that? I said during the campaign to all: "Gentlemen, when this is over, I am through."

"'I have not called upon Mr. Cleveland to fulfill any campaign contract, for the simple reason that none was made by me. I have not asked him to appoint a man to office, simply because I had said that when the campaign was over I was through. I say again that I made no contracts either with Mr. Van Alen or anybody else. There were no promises made even by inference.

"'Concerning the alleged remark of Mr. Cleveland that he has 'learned to distrust Mr. Whitney and his tricks,' I can only say that I do not believe that Mr. Cleveland ever made that remark.'

"'Mr. Whitney,' said the reporter, 'there has been another version of Mr. Van Alen's contribution heard here in New York. It is to the effect that Mr. Van Alen firmly believed that he was to get the place of minister to Rome in consideration of his campaign contributions, and that when he found that he was not to have the place a number of Democrats put their hands in their pockets and made up the amount of Mr. Van Alen's contribution and handed it over to him. Would you like to say anything about that?'

"'Oh, no,' replied Mr. Whitney; 'that is just as nonsensical as the Washington story. It is utter nonsense throughout. I can not make myself plainer on this story than I have to you.'

"I read the novel and interesting suggestion made by Mr. Horace White, that in such cases where offices have been promised for money, the money should be returned in all cases. Although not especially pertinent at this time, as no such case existed, I take the occasion to differ from his opinion. I think the man should lose both office and money and be forever barred from decent society.

"Such, I think, would be Mr. Van Alen's opinion if it can be gathered from a letter which he wrote at about the time spoken of by Mr. White, and in which he takes what I consider the more correct view. It was called out by a letter from a friend who had heard of the White syndicate. The letter was as follows:

"'MAY 11, 1893.

"'DEAR ——: Many thanks for your letter of yesterday. I am much surprised at the charges you say have been made against me. Certainly, if the President believes them, my appointment to any position would be scandalous.

"'I can only say that these charges that I stated I was to have a diplomatic position in exchange for money subscribed by me for political purposes are utterly false, and I defy any one to prove that I have written, spoken, or hinted at one word indicating in any way such an agreement. I should be a combination of knave, fool, and liar to have made such a statement, for there was absolutely no understanding between myself and any one that I should have any office under the Government.

"'What was said on the subject was said after the election in November last, and was merely an expression of a wish on my part and a promise of assistance * * * in carrying out my wishes.

"'Yours very truly,

"'J. J. VAN ALEN.'

"I trust you will gather from these letters and interviews that instead of there being any contract that Mr. Van Alen should have the Italian mission, the President was distinctly in terms informed by me: 'There is no obligation upon you to appoint him to any office.'

"Mr. Van Alen had the support of his State for this appointment, was personally known to the President, and was selected as a gentleman deemed competent and fit for the post.

"Yours truly,

"W. C. WHITNEY.

"NEW YORK, September 27, 1893."

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. It will thus be seen, Mr. Chairman, that the charges made at the time, and which have been reiterated by my honorable friend from Illinois, were fully and completely disposed of long ago, unless you believe that in listening to that letter that you are listening to the words of a man capable of uttering falsehood. That letter was a plain, simple vindication of himself and of Mr. Van Alen, and Mr. Whitney at least, needed, I hope, no vindication in the minds of the American people.

The appointment by the President of the United States would imply that he must have been party to the agreement between Mr. Whitney and Mr. Van Alen. Now, I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the time has not come when a man elevated to the high position which Mr. Harrison occupied by the vote of the people of the United States, and which Mr. Grover Cleveland now occupies by the vote of a majority of the people of the United States—I hope, I say, the time has not yet come when any man occupying that high position can have his character assailed, or when anybody will feel authorized to assail the character of a man great and powerful enough to be elected the first officer, the ruler, of this great country, whether he belongs to one party or another.

I hope, I say, the time has not come when anybody will venture to attempt to involve the President of the United States in anything which looks to the carrying out of a compact tainted not only with fraud, but with a species of villainous immorality that would shock the moral sense even of men of the lowest estate; or when the President of the United States can be held up to the American people as deserving their condemnation because he has chosen to appoint to a Cabinet office or to any other position within his gift, a man who belongs to the wealthy class of the community. Some people have regarded it as a piece of good fortune to be rich. Others seem to regard it as a great misfortune to be rich. I do not belong to either of these classes, the poor or the rich. I am not here to vindicate the one or the other, for I stand on the middle ground.

But I have no sympathy, sir, with any attempt to arraign a man simply because his industry, his energy, his skill, his ability, have made him a rich man. He has a right to do with his money what he pleases. He has a right to appropriate it to whatever use he pleases, and no one has a right to offer any criticism.

Mr. REED made a remark sotto voce.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. What did the gentlemen from Maine remark?

Mr. REED. I merely suggested that in enumerating the means by which men acquire fortune the gentleman from Mississippi had neglected to mention the particular means by which it had been acquired in the case at issue, namely, by inheritance.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. By inheritance. Well, I am not aware that that is a crime either.

Mr. REED. Oh, by no means; it is a very delightful privilege.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Yes, it is, and I have never heard of any man who was placed in the category of being rich by inheritance who insisted upon distributing his inherited wealth among his poorer fellow-citizens.

Mr. WALKER. That would probably be considered on the Democratic side a more honorable way of acquiring wealth than by honest industry.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Ah, Mr. Chairman, most of the money that is made in the section of the country from which I come is made by hard licks under the hottest sun of summer, which the gentleman from Massachusetts probably has not felt for the last thirty or forty years. [Laughter.] I say then, Mr. Chairman, that no man has a right to attack the President of the United States simply because he has chosen to appoint one man or another to office, whether he be a Republican or a Democratic President, and I have no sympathy with any such assaults.

Now, with regard to the settlement of this Hawaiian matter, it has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] that the President of the United States wanted to restore a rotten monarchy. What interest has the President of the United States in a monarchy of any sort, rotten or sound? What interest has Grover Cleveland, the present occupant of the Presidency in any monarchy—a man raised in the State of New York who has lived a great part of his life in a small village in that State, a man ingrained with love of liberty and with devotion to the flag and the interests of our country—what interest has such a man in a monarchy? Surely he could at least afford to act with the same decency with which the British Government acted in the case which I have called attention. He could at least afford to side with John W. Foster, Mr. Harrison's Secretary of State, and say to Mr. Stevens "you have acted without authority and beyond the instructions which you received from this Government."

Mr. Chairman, I say that no man who will free his mind from political prejudice will fail to give to the President of the United States the meed of just praise for his action in reference to that matter. He is one of our fellow-citizens selected by his fellow-citizens to hold the loftiest office within the gift of the American people, and in order to condemn him my honorable friend from Illinois and the other gentlemen who concur in the views which he has expressed will have to conclude that the majority of the people of the United States, whether they happen to be at one time on the Republican side or at another time on the Democratic side, are corrupt and unworthy to be trusted with power. The present President of the United States in every act that has characterized him since he has been placed in that high office during this Administration as well as in his former Administration has achieved for himself the highest reputation for wisdom and justice.

I differ with him, and differ with him widely upon one question, the silver question. He may be right and I may be wrong, or I may be right and he may be wrong upon that question, but it is my right as a Representative to hold my own views, and strongly and emphatically as I differ with the President I do not hesitate to say that the first man in the United States who would most cheerfully accord to me my right to hold my own opinion as a representative of my constituents, and to express it by my views and by my vote here, would be President Cleveland himself. Differing with him as I do upon this one question, I am still a Democrat and a Democrat on principle, and as he was selected by the majority of the Democracy of the United States, however widely I may differ with him on any particular question, I stand by him as the chosen representative of the Democracy of the country, and in the discharge of the duties of the high office to which he has been elected by the people I sustain him and agree with him, and I do not want to do it in any faint or stinted terms of praise. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I certainly can not disagree with my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] in the platitudes which he has announced to the House. Everybody, of course, agrees with them. Nor am I here to criticise Mr. Van Alen. I think that when a Democrat can be found who will decline an office he ought to be distinguished if not honored. [Laughter.] I agree also with my friend as to the vice and the crime of using money in elections. But I do not think he was quite fair when he stated that they use no money in the South, while we use it in the North. His statement may be correct; but would it not have been quite fair for him to have gone a little farther and stated that the reason they do not use money in the South is that they have other and worse methods of accomplishing their purposes at the polls than the use of money?

Mr. WALKER. Oh, no; not worse; more honorable, you mean.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I mean what I say. I like my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], but I can not allow him to be my interpreter. [Laughter.]

But I have been charmed by the sublime—and I ought perhaps to say childlike—faith and confidence and hope of my friend from Mississippi in attempting to resurrect the Hawaiian policy of the Administration and make it respectable. It is the best evidence I have ever yet seen of the truth, or at least of the most firm faith in the truth, of the doctrine of the resurrection from the dead.

I shall not attempt here to-day to defend Mr. Stevens. He is my constituent: he has been my friend for thirty years. I know him well. I shall not spend time in defending him, because he does not need defense here. The gentleman from Mississippi says Mr. Stevens had been condemned by the Secretary of State during the Administration of Mr. Harrison. Sir, he was not condemned at all. The Secretary of State simply showed that the action of Mr. Stevens had a broader reach than Mr. Stevens himself thought it had. In other words, the action of Mr. Stevens, as the Secretary of State said, amounted to the Government of the United States assuming a protectorate over the Hawaiian Islands. That is all there was in that matter. There was no rebuke of the action of Mr. Stevens, except so far as it perhaps reached beyond the line which the minister himself expected it to reach.

But when the gentleman says that Minister Stevens was rebuked by this House—why, Mr. Chairman, what could you expect? Here is a House with 90 Democratic majority. Does anybody suppose that a man who raised the American flag anywhere where there was the slightest doubt of the propriety of it, would not be rebuked by this Democratic House? I have noticed with a great deal of amusement and some degree of interest the uneasiness of our Democratic friends over this raising of the flag. It seems to come before them as Banquo's ghost did before Macbeth; and they are sorry that it will not "down" at their bidding. It did "down" at your bidding [addressing the Democratic side of the House] in Hawaii. But that flag will yet be raised upon the Sandwich Islands; and it will be raised to stay there: and no Democratic emissary of any Democratic Administration will pull it down. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Stevens "condemned by the people of this country!" Why, sir, if I could have the faith in anything in this world that I do not absolutely know to exist that my friend must have in order to make such a statement as that and to believe it himself—if I were a thousand times richer than he is, I should be glad to give all I owned and all I could ever earn for such a faith. "Condemned by the American people!" I believe today that if there has ever been a man in this country whose action was sustained by the people of the country—not only of his own party, but of your party—it is John L. Stevens who raised the American flag at Honolulu. He is a man who in private life is without stain. He has been in the diplomatic service of the country, I think, thirteen years: and no man who has been in that service has made a more honorable record than has been made by John L. Stevens. The crime that he committed in the eyes of this Administration and the Democratic party was that he believed in his country. He believed in extending her interests. He believed that the civilization which had been created and had been built up in the Hawaiian Islands by the American people should be sustained by them.

My friend says, let the people of Hawaii work out their own salvation. Why, they did work out their own salvation. They achieved the revolution which placed an intelligent and honest and pure government in power in those islands. And what did this Administration do? I am not here to say hard words of this Administration. I thoroughly believe, with my friend, that men in power should not be the targets of the slanderer. But that is their fate. You know that nineteen hundred years ago Horace sang that the tall pines are shaken by the winds, while the modest shrubs of the valley are undisturbed. I agree with my friend that such ought not to be the fate of public men, but it is.

He says, what motive could the Administration have in instituting a bad government in Hawaii? I do not know. I am not here to discuss the motives of the Administration. I am not inclined to give every man, whether he be in office or out of office, the credit of bad motives when he does good things. But no matter about the motives; no matter whether you think the President of the United States would want to restore a monarchy in the Sandwich Islands or not: no matter whether you can search out and discover any motive for the act, the absolute fact that he did it can not be argued down by saying that he had no motive for doing it.

Now, one word more, Mr. Chairman. I got up here not to trouble the House with a speech. Mr. Stevens was sustained in the Senate of the United States by the report of perhaps the ablest Democrat that lives in this country at this time. I allude to the Senator from Alabama, Mr. MORGAN. That report vindicates him from beginning to end, with the simple slight exception of what is acknowledged to be in the report of no consequence—the raising of the American flag. And if my friend from Mississippi is satisfied with a report of a Democrat of Democrats, the report of a man who is acknowledged by both parties to be one of the most intelligent men in this country, especially in connection with our foreign affairs, I say if he is satisfied with that report, I am satisfied: Mr. Stevens I know is satisfied, and his friends throughout the country are amply satisfied with the verdict of the most distinguished man you have in either House of Congress.

You can say what you please of Mr. Stevens's action there. It was in the line of progress: it was in the interest of civilization; it was patriotic, and when perhaps all of us are forgotten, future generations in the island of Hawaii will remember John L. Stevens as we remember the men to whom we look back as those who have done good for their country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Mr. COOMBS withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I have only one motive in rising to address the committee at this stage in the consideration of the bill, and that is, if possible, to clear up certain misapprehensions which appear to exist in the minds of gentlemen upon the other side of the House with regard to what has gone into history as the Van Alen incident.

I was very much entertained and instructed by the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] as to the extremely cheap way that they have of conducting elections down there. I remember once sitting in the gallery of this House when the late Gen. Spinola was on the floor, explaining to gentlemen on the other side why it was impossible for him to do what they insisted he should do. The committee will understand that this is an explanation which Democratic members from New York are often called upon to give to their colleagues. It is generally impossible for the Democratic Representatives from my city and State to agree with the rest of their party, except upon the one subject of getting into office. Upon that they are entirely harmonious, but when they get into office, differences and dissensions at once arise.

Gen. Spinola was endeavoring to explain that in New York at least gentlemen were called to account for what they did here. I remember his words quite distinctly. He said down South a gentleman gets together with his neighbors and they say, "Here, we will send one of you to Congress," and one of them speaks up and says, "I think it is my turn to go," and the rest of them say, "Yes, we think it is;" whereupon, an agreement of that kind being effected, the gentleman's name is put on the ballots, and they are put into the boxes, and whether they are few or many, the gentleman is conveniently returned.

Now, I have no doubt that under that system it is comparatively cheap to get into office from the South: but I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi, for his encouragement, that if he will take a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-morrow and carefully mark that portion of his speech in reference to the Hon. William C. Whitney and send it to him, as I have no doubt he will by the first mail, and if he will then come and locate in New York, he will find it quite as cheap to come back here from New York as from Mississippi.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. QUIGG. With pleasure. Go ahead.

Mr. ENLOE. I should like to know if that is the way the gentleman got here himself?

Mr. QUIGG. No, that is not the way I got here myself. If the gentleman wants to know how I got here myself, I will tell him. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] I got here because you enabled the people of the Fourteenth Congressional district of New York, 10,000 Democratic as they are, to take a yea-and-nay vote on the Wilson bill.

That is how I got here. You gave them the opportunity to say, not merely in their own behalf, not merely in behalf of the people of New York City and New York State, but in behalf of the people of the whole country, you gave them the opportunity to put into the ballot boxes of a single Congressional district the whole pentup feeling of the nation. You gave them the opportunity to say, on behalf of the manufacturers of the North and East, on behalf of the grain-growers of the West and South, on behalf of the miners of the Rocky Mountains, on behalf of the fruit culturists of the Pacific Slope, on behalf of the whole industrial soul of the continent, "Stop! This party of shame and destruction must go no farther!" [Applause on the Republican side.]

That is how I came to Congress, and you are answered: now sit down. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks it is decent manners to tell a member to take his seat when he has answered a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to be interrupted, and the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order.

Mr. QUIGG. I will yield to the gentleman; what did you say?

Mr. ENLOE. I said this, if you want to hear what I said: I say that if you did come into Congress, you have not learned decent manners, to address a member and ask him to take his seat. [Cries of "Ah!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. REED. I suppose he has learned such manners here.

Mr. ENLOE. I did not hear what the gentleman from Maine said.

Mr. QUIGG. I did not apprehend my answer to the gentleman would afford him any great delight; and I am quite satisfied he does not feel any.

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman will allow me to ask him a respectful question, I would do so.

Mr. QUIGG. I shall, with great pleasure.

Mr. ENLOE. And that is, to inquire of him whether he has accomplished the purpose he had in coming here. Has he "killed the Wilson bill"?

Mr. QUIGG. I did not say I would. I did say to the people of that district that if they would elect a Republican to Congress from a Democratic district in a great manufacturing city that probably the majority here would show some little sense. [Laughter.]

I told them that I thought probably the result would be that the Democrats would understand that the gun was loaded [renewed laughter on the Republican side], and that they would know or find out by that slow process of education that they had better not go any further. I do not say you had sense enough to appreciate it. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I will not undertake any such contract as to deliver you on that proposition. I only thought so, and I did not think that very hard, either. [Laughter.] I hoped so; and I hope so yet and I rather think the Wilson bill is smashed. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] But that is quite aside from the purpose of my remarks. Does the gentleman desire to ask some more questions?

Mr. ENLOE. I suppose, then, that its death is perhaps due to the fact that the gentleman was returned from that district; and perhaps he is the author of the speech recently delivered by the distinguished gentleman from New York in the other branch of this body. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. QUIGG. I should be very willing, gentlemen, to be the author of that speech; but I can assure the gentleman from Tennessee that it never occurs to any Republican from New York, unfortunately, to suppose that the senior Senator from that State is not able to take care of himself. He has done so frequently to our dismay and disparity, and I should hope to your satisfaction.

Mr. Chairman, I intended to refer a little to the Van Alen incident, and that merely in order that the truth of history may be proclaimed.

Gentlemen on the other side have evidently been laboring under several kinds of misapprehension. In the first place the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the gentleman who followed him [Mr. HOOKER] are under a misapprehension as to the name of this very well known and distinguished Democrat, who has performed such signal service to his party that he is entitled to be appointed an ambassador to represent this country abroad. Those gentlemen do not even know his name. [Laughter.] His name is not Von Allen, but Van Alen. That is the first misapprehension that I want to correct. The second is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] who introduced this somewhat entangling controversy said anything about Mr. Van Alen having done anything bad, or about Mr. Whitney having done anything bad.

Certainly I am not here to accuse either of those gentlemen, though I would like to say to the gentleman from Mississippi if he were here, that although none of us from New York are going to attack Mr. Whitney here, or to put up a list of crimes that he has committed, yet we do not, in New York, think that he is exactly a whole heaven of cherubim and seraphim rolled into one single individual. [Laughter.] We do not think he is quite that sort of a being. We have heard of a number of things that he is supposed to have done, and the Van Alen incident illustrates them all. The misapprehension that the gentlemen labor under is as to what the gentleman from Illinois said, and as to the purport of it. He did not say that a man ought not to give any money to political campaigns—though it would seem that everybody who gave money to support the Democratic party in the last campaign ought to feel very much ashamed of himself, in view of the present situation of the country. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Certainly he has not got his money back as the result of the business he has done since that party came into power. The proposition, however, was not that Democrats ought not to contribute to their party, nor that a man who has contributed to his party is thereby necessarily inhibited from holding office. The point the gentleman from Illinois raised was, that the New York Democratic newspapers, not merely the New York Evening Post, but the New York Sun, the New York Times, the New York World, and all the New York Democratic newspapers had pointed to the fact that when Mr. Cleveland was standing in Lenox Hall addressing the country, and was saying what I am about to read, he was contemplating the appointment of Mr. Van Alen to this office under the conditions that we all know. What Mr. Cleveland said on that occasion was this:

> We daily hear predictions of Republican success, based upon the ability of that party to purchase the votes of the people. A little reflection, it seems to me, can not fail to arouse the American conscience to the wickedness as well as the peril of a debauched suffrage. It is a plain proposition that our Government is only true to the principles upon which it rests when in its operations it represents the honest and intelligent sentiment of the people. When it does not, its vigor and its very life are gone and it remains but the mere semblance of a free government, the weakest and most deformed plan of rule that ever deluded mankind.

And now listen to what follows, for the main point is that Mr. Cleveland uttered this sentiment in his Lenox Museum speech:

> It can then no longer defend the rights of all, because rights will be forgotten in the capricious bestowal of favors

When Mr. Cleveland said that, he had Mr. Van Alen's $50,000 jingling in his pocket, metaphorically speaking; and that is the point which the New York Democratic newspapers made and that was repeated yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be well for gentlemen on the other side who imagine that the Republicans have done something of this kind, that the Republicans have received money from certain people and have thereupon appointed them to office, that they have taken the bribes of rich nobodies and put them in office as a reward—I think it would be well for gentlemen who profess to believe this to call for an investigation by Congress and go into the question carefully. And the first witness they should call ought to be the man whom the gentleman from Mississippi has eulogized so highly, the Hon. William C. Whitney. Let them call Mr. Whitney, and if they ask him questions enough and the right kind of questions, I shall be very glad to hear from the gentleman from Mississippi on the subject of Mr. William C. Whitney again after that investigation.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. We will put you on the committee and you can ask him whatever questions you want.

Mr. QUIGG. I shall be delighted.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, looking upon the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], I am reminded of one of the sweet singers of Israel. When I see his hair parted in the middle and his countenance irradiated with that smile which reminds me of the cherubim, I am not surprised that he should make the speech that has just been delivered; but I want to say to him that when he has been here a few years longer he will perhaps have learned that this is not the place for cherubim and seraphim. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairmen, the gentlemen who have discussed this question have drifted away from the subject under consideration, and I have simply arisen for the purpose of replying to what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS], who has lauded the late Postmaster-General Wanamaker and given him an advertisement, for which I have no doubt Mr. Wanamaker will make him a very handsome present.

In reply to what has fallen from the gentleman in the way of laudation of that "good man," Cheap John Wanamaker, of the city of Philadelphia, late Postmaster-General of the United States, who contributed so much money for the purpose of "frying the fat" out of certain people and debauching the voters of Pennsylvania and of other States of this Union in the interest of Mr. Benjamin Harrison and his party, and leaving Mr. Van Alen out of this question—a gentleman who needs no defense at my hands and no defense at the hands of the Democratic party, because his case has been passed upon by the Senate—I desire to say that the very charges which have been brought here against the appointment of Mr. Van Alen can be brought with much more force against the late Postmaster-General, whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] has lauded to the skies—that man who was for four years the Postmaster-General of the United States, and who used his office, as I believe, for the purpose of advertising his wares and merchandise.

Now, let me say that I come from a rural district, in which, in many cases, there were not Republicans living near enough to the post-offices to hold those positions; and under Mr. John Wanamaker those little post-offices in our country were farmed out to Republicans who lived miles and miles away. I wrote a letter to Mr. Wanamaker—I wish I had a copy of it here—in which I stated that the people who received their mails did not care particularly who might hold the post-offices; that they wanted honest men to distribute their mails; they wanted men who, when letters were received, would try to deliver them to the proper persons; and that the theory of this Government and of the Post-Office Department was not, in my judgment, to give post-offices to any particular party or any particular persons, but that persons should be selected with the intelligence and honesty to discharge the duties incumbent upon them as postmasters.

To that letter I received no reply. I cited two instances in my own county where the postmaster lived nearer to some other office—where he lived miles away from the office of which he was postmaster; yet the position was rented or leased out to some one e se, and the emoluments of the office were divided between the man who was acting as postmaster and the real postmaster.

I say that under the administration of Mr. Wanamaker, this merchant of Philadelphia, who has had himself advertised here by the gentleman from his State, there never was such mismanagement in the history of this country as existed in postal matters in the district from which I come; and the reason was that the men who were appointed postmasters lived miles and miles away from their offices, and in many cases did not receive their mails at the offices of which they were postmasters, but rented out the positions and divided the proceeds with such persons as they could get to perform the duties of the office.

Now I am not here to defend Mr. Van Alen, whose name has been brought into this controversy; but I am here to throw back into the teeth of the gentleman from Pennsylvania the name of that man who raised, it is said—whether it be true or not—$400,000 for the election of Mr. Harrison, and who received as a reward for what he did this high Cabinet position under the Administration of Mr. Harrison.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, we have now at last absolutely settled certain facts. First, it is entirely clear that Mr. Whitney is a good man. Second, it is entirely clear that Mr. Cleveland is a good man. Third, it is finally settled that Mr. Van Alen was not appointed to the office for which he was nominated because he gave $50,000 for campaign purposes. Now why was he appointed? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to imagine for one moment that I have risen for the purpose of answering his question. I did not expect to throw any light on this consular and diplomatic bill when I came into this Hall: but it is perfectly evident that light is needed on the subject; and as we are having a variety of contributions to this discussion, I have a slight contribution which I want to make myself.

I understand from the speech which was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] that one of the purposes of this discussion is to learn how it was that he broke into Congress. I asked him a question intended to develop whether or not his idea was that Congressional seats were bought and sold, as he intimated, in the city of New York. Thereupon the gentleman proceeded to give the reasons why he came here as the representative from a district which h s, as he says, 10,000 Democratic majority.

I was not entirely satisfied with his explanation. His statement that he was sent here to kill the Wilson bill after it had passed this House, was not entirely conclusive to my mind that that was the motive of the constituency that sent him; and if that had been the purpose, I do not see why another Democratic district of New York sent a Democratic Representative who about the same time took his seat on this side of the House. I re er to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRAUS.] I do not think his explanation explains. I will undertake before I get through to give another version of the matter which may in some measure account for it.

But before doing so I want to allude to what has been said about the appointment of Mr. Van Alen as minister to Italy. I do not know anything about the reasons for the appointment of that gentleman. I do not know whether he contributed $50,000 to the campaign fund or not. I do not know whether there was any agreement between him and Mr. Whitney about that matter or not. But admitting, for argument's s ke, that such was the motive for his appointment, and that he was induced to make that contribution with the promise that he should have that position, it comes with exceeding bad grace from gentlemen on the other side to arraign the Administration for it. I suppose the gentleman who has been addressing the House has not been in politics long enough to know anything about the history of the campaign of 1888—but possibly he does know something about it. I want to call his attention to the circular issued by Mr. James P. Foster, the president of the Republican League of the United States, just preceding the canvass of 1888.

It is a circular known in common parlance as the "fat-frying circular." Mr. Foster made a very interesting contribution to the political history of that time, and it seems that the manufacturers derived very satisfactory returns from the fat they surrendered to the Republican managers. Mr. Foster's confidential letters to the beneficiaries of the protective tariff read as follows:

[Confidential.]

HEADQUARTERS REPUBLICAN LEAGUE OF THE UNITED STATES,
New York, May 25, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: The Republican League of the United States desires to bring you face to face with the startling fact that the coming Presidential election is not to be fought on the old party lines which have heretofore divided Democrats and Republicans, but upon the direct issue of free trade vs. protection. We will win this fight if you will do your share and help us to finish what we have begun. We want money, and want it at once.

It may not be of your personal knowledge, but it is a fact nevertheless, that the manufacturers of the United States who are most benefited by our tariff laws have been the least willing to contribute to the success of the party which gave them protection and which is about to engage in a life-and-death struggle with free trade.

A Republican United States Senator, from a State which never had a Democratic Representative in either House of Congress or a Democratic State officer, in speaking of the well-known disposition of the manufacturing interests to lock up its money, fold its hands, and look on while somebody else fights for its success, says:

"The campaign which we are about to enter will concern, more than anybody else, the manufacturers of this country. They have hitherto been very laggard in their contributions to the Republican cause. In fact, if I could punish them without punishing the cause of protection itself, I would consign them to the hottest place I could think of on account of their craven parsimony. If this class of people do not care to contribute to the success of the Republican party, they are welcome to try their chances under a Democratic Administration: I can stand it as long as they can.

"In fact, I have it from the best possible source that the manufacturers of Pennsylvania, who are more highly protected than anybody else and who make large fortunes every year when times are prosperous, practically give nothing toward the maintenance of the ascendancy of the Republican party. Of course I shall not violate what I consider to be a proper principle of action, but if I had my way about it I would put the manufacturers of Pennsylvania under the fire and fry all the fat out of them. If the Mills tariff bill comes to the Senate there will be some votes cast there which will open the eyes of some of these people who have, while gathering their millions, treated the Republican party as their humble servant."

These are strong words, and bitter, but they are true, and it now remains with you and your associates to determine whether they are to be reiterated after this campaign is over, and protection has, through your apathy, been struck its deathb ow. If you give us the means to win the victory we will do it. Are you willing?

Yours, very truly,

JAS. P. FOSTER, President.

During that campaign a distinguished Senator from the State of Pennsylvania went to a shrewd, ambitious, and not overscrupulous tradesman in Philadelphia and represented the dire necessities of the Republican party for money to be used in corrupting the suffrages of the people in order to restore that party to power, and that same tradesman, then known simply as John Wanamaker, went out and raised $400,000 to put into the campaign, and in return for that contribution he was given a position in the Cabinet and was taken near to the heart of the President whom he had succeeded in electing. It took $400,000 to discover his great abilities as a statesman, but the $400,000 argument was convincing and conclusive.

Now, the gentleman from New York was not here when that occurred, and possibly had not commenced to practice the arts of politics at that time; hence he may be ignorant of this part of our political history, and that may account for his allusions to the Van Alen incident. I suppose, however, that some of the older politicians on the floor may have dragged that into the discussion earlier in the debate, and he took up the trail and is yelping on the track. I have not been in the Hall during the debate, and will not stop to inquire who is responsible for the course of the discussion.

Mr. Wanamaker did not deny the contribution, or disdain the bargain by which he was made Postmaster-General. He said, in an interview:

When QUAY sent for me I was surprised. I had no more idea of what he wanted with me than you might have if he telegraphed for you. But I knew he was not the kind of man to send for me unless he had important business with me, so I went. Then he told me that the national Republican committee needed money, and his scheme for my raising it. I at first declined to have anything to do with it. I had very little hope of defeating Cleveland, and still less Mrs. Cleveland, who is justly popular with the whole country, and whom I admire greatly myself, and I did not want to get on a sinking ship. He urged the matter, told me why he felt sure of carrying the election if he had the money. Even then I hesitated, and asked three weeks for consideration. He agreed, and I talked with our leading manufacturers, men whose names are the best in the land—such men as Washburne and Amos Lawrence's grandson, and a dozen others I could name—men who would never have given a dollar for dishonest uses, even if I had been willing to ask it, and at the end of the three weeks I told QUAY I would undertake to raise the money if he would allow us to establish a manufacturers' bureau and have a voice in the disposition of the money. I do not mean that we insisted on knowing what was done with every dollar of it. I did not want to know. When I sell a suit of clothes, I do not insist upon being told just where these clothes are going. My responsibility ceases when I furnish a good article at a fair price. What I did insist upon was that I should be able to satis y the men who trusted me with their money that it was used for the purposes for which they subscribed it, and that guaranty Mr. QUAY gave me. That is how there came to be a manufacturers' bureau.

Mr. PIGOTT. Before the gentleman from Tennessee takes his seat I would like him to tell the House, if he can, why it was that T. Jefferson Coolidge was sent as minister to France at the tail end of the last Administration?

Mr. ENLOE. I will re er that to the gentleman from Maine, and put one conundrum against the other. He may answer them both himself.

Now, there is a little more history on this subject that ought to go in in this connection. In April, 1889——

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman allow me to answer the question just asked him?

Mr. ENLOE. I can not allow the gentleman to answer in my time. He can take his own time to do it.

Mr. WALKER. It would take only a moment.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not yield for an answer in my time.

Mr. WALKER. I want to say this——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee declines to yield, and will not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. ENLOE. I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that in April, 1889, the Manufacturers' Record, published in Philadelphia, said this:

It is, therefore, to the men that give the cash that a large, if not the largest, share of success is due. These, almost always, are the business men. We make the assertion that the money contributed by this (manufacturers') club last year had more influence upon the result of the national election than all the skill, the ingenuity, the labor, and the wire-pulling of all the professional politicians in the city of Philadelphia. We believe this proposition to be capable of positive proof. If, therefore, control of patronage is rightly the reward of victorious effort, the right of this club to name the Federal officeholders of Philadelphia rests upon solid grounds. * * * The leaders, we suppose, will claim that they are the men who win victories, and that their generalship entitles them to special consideration. But they can win no triumphs without strong backing in money and votes from the best members of their party. If the politicians had had to fight single-handed the battle of last November, Mr. Cleveland would now be in the White House. They were literally smitten with paralysis until the manufacturers and other business men came to the rescue, not only with abundant supplies of money, but with a determination to carry the day by hard work and actively exerted influence. That was how the fight was won.

It is distinctly understood that the manufacturers of this country have raised money for the purpose of preventing the people from reforming the tariff. They will raise it again in the coming campaign. Perhaps they sought to give this country an object lesson in electing the gentleman [Mr. QUIGG] from a Democratic district in New York; and perhaps he has been swimming over a sea of corruption in the city of New York unconscious of the depths and the dirt beneath him. Perhaps a corruption fund was sent there by Republican manufacturers to control that Democratic district in order to punish this Congress for passing the Wilson bill; and I will admit it was pretty severe punishment; but I acquit the gentleman of any knowledge of any such thing, for I am satisfied that he rests upon the bosom of the Republican party ignorant of the means of his election and very little responsible for the result.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to defend the appointment of Mr. Van Alen. I know nothing about his qualifications. If he contributed $50,000 to the campaign fund, according to Republican authority and Republican argument, that was the strongest and the best reason why he should have been appointed to this place; but I want to say this for Mr. Van Alen, who is not here to speak for himself, that if any such trade as this was contemplated, he at least had the decency not to disgrace the American people by accepting the bribe, as did John Wanamaker, under a Republican Administration.

Mr. Van Alen declined to accept this place. He repudiated any such bargain or agreement. He denied the existence of any such understanding, express or implied, and I think that he acted with decency and credit to himself, when his outcry was made against the appointment, in declining to serve in that branch of the public service. That is all I desire to say upon this question, Mr. Chairman, and I should not have said that but for the manner in which the gentleman responded to my interruption.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I believe we have under consideration the diplomatic appropriation bill. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], who is in charge of the bill, took occasion to make a political harangue this morning and to contradict his colleague upon that committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], touching the amount spent from the contingent fund for consulates, saying that it had never been over $150,000. He declined to yield for a correction. Why, I will say to the gentleman now that since he made his speech I have made an examination, and there is an estimate for $46,000 over and above the $150,000 for the year 1893; and year by year the expenditure has been from $40,000 to $60,000 more than the $150,000. Now, I do not know whether the gentleman knows it or not. The committee that originates the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill ought to know.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly; although the gentleman himself declined to yield awhile ago.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman tell me in what year more than $150,000 was appropriated?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes; in the year 1889.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. When within the last four years?

Mr. HITT. In 1891 and in 1890 $228,000; not appropriated in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, but in that and the deficiency bill.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Ah! I stated that $150,000 has been appropriated in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. That is what I stated, and I state it again. I have the appropriation bills on my table.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman will go back to his remarks he will find that his statement was broader than that.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. We do not propose in this Administration to have any deficiencies. [Manifestations of derision on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let me say to the gentleman here and now that for the year 1893 the regular diplomatic appropriation bill carried $150,000. Yet there is now pending before the Committee on Appropriations, which makes up the deficiency bills, an estimate of this Administration for $46,000 and over, with the statement that the money has been expended.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. In the Fifty-first Congress, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is it not true that $150,000 was appropriated each year to pay the contingent expenses of the consulates?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes. Now you are going to plead a set-off, are you? That is what you have been doing or trying to do all day.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. No. I am not trying to plead a set off, but when there is so much wisdom on your side to suggest an increase now, you ought, when you had the power, to have made the increase if it was necessary.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. What I claim is that the gentleman ought to know, if he did not know, and if he did know he ought to have been frank with the committee and told it—that while his bill only carries $150,000 for the contingent fund as expressed, yet that it is absolutely certain, in the light of the service for 1893, that there will come in a year from now an estimate for from $46,000 to $50,000 more, which will be asked for. If he had stated that, then he would have covered the whole ground.

And that is what I now state, because I happen to be on the Committee on Appropriations; and within the last two weeks we have had the officials of the State Department before us and hauled them over the coals about this matter.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Was it necessary to make a deficiency appropriation for those two years alluded to, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, certainly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Of what amount?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Substantially about $50,000; and it will be necessary twelve months from now, when we make up the deficiency bill just as we are going to do it now, when we report the regular deficiency bill in two or three weeks. That is all there is of it. So much for that.

I will under the five-minute rule call attention, for consideration, when we come to the very business of appropriations, to some matters touching the consular service and the diplomatic service, in connection with the salaries, some of which have lately been increased and some of which it is proposed to increase. And it seems to me, as they are arranged, that I can not discover from the best reading that I can give as to that service, at the various consulates, that they are arranged equitably as to pay. I do not know whether there are any favorites or not, but there are strange things in it; and I will be honest about it. Time out of mind there have been some strange things in the diplomatic and consular service touching the salaries. They have not been equitable.

I have said so time and again when the Republicans were in power; and there are some strange things, and very strange things in it now, which I think I can demonstrate under the five-minute rule. But I will not speak further of that matter at this time, because the only real debate which affects legislation and affects appropriations comes when you have the very item under consideration which you propose to amend, to strike out, or to insert.

I have listened to this general political debate. It was started by my colleague, and very ably started, as I think, yesterday. Yet, I did not think my colleague was as happy as I have heard him heretofore, because ordinarily when he makes a speech before this House touching the foreign relations of this Government, or on any other subject, he comes using his own language, drawing his own conclusions, telling what he knows of the public service and its necessities.

I think I have listened to him time and again, when I have gained more information than I ever gained from anybody else upon the floor of this House touching this service, because I say, knowing it to be true, that in my judgment he is the best equipped man touching the foreign relations of the Government that has service in the House. [Applause.] On yesterday when I listened to him he showed he had merit, that he had great merit, that he has industry: but as I listened I found out that he was not making his speech at all, but that he was picking up and giving to the House and to the country what the New York Sun, the New York World, and the New York Evening Post and other Democratic papers had said about this service; and then he called attention to what some great and good Mugwumps who stand close to the elbow and whisper into the ear of the "great and good" President on this subject. And as he enforced his points I could see—and I have not got very good sight, but without adjusting my glasses I could see the color come and go a little bit in the face of my honorable friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], and I could see the redness rise up all over the face of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY].

Well, they have both replied to my colleague [Mr. HITT]. After all it is Democrat against Democrat, with this exception—that the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Mississippi are members of this House and Representatives upon the floor and have time and privileges of the floor, while the New York Sun, the wicked New York World, and the very, very, very wicked Evening Post can not come in here at all except you bring it in to read it. [Laughter]. That is all quarreled out by these gentlemen.

I am not going to abuse the diplomatic service. I am not going to abuse that great and good man, the premier who stands at the head of the Cabinet. [Laughter.] I am not going to abuse your great and good Cabinet as a whole. I am not going to abuse Grover Cleveland. If I dipped my tongue in gall I could not say anything half so mean as the Democratic press is saying about the whole "outfit," or as I hear said day by day by various Democrats upon the floor of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER. Or anything more true.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Or anything more true, as the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests.

Gentlemen have talked here about John Wanamaker and Benjamin Harrison, and they have called Mr. Wanamaker "Cheap John," and all that kind of thing. Well, it is not for me to defend John Wanamaker. He is a man who is known of the people of this country, and who has stamped the impress of his ability and his industry upon the business of this country. He has made a success and an honored name, and he was a good Postmaster-General, and Harrison gave us a good Administration. It does not make any difference whether you love it or whether I love it; it stands there speaking for itself when you test it by the public records. By the aid and support of the Republican party and a Republican Congress, the Fifty-first, the Harrison Administration stands the equal of any Administration in this country, save alone one, the Administration of Abraham Lincoln, when we lived a century in four years. It is not necessary for me to defend the Harrison Administration.

I say again, it speaks for itself, and so does the record of the Republican party. But now, gentlemen on the other side, you have got the power. After thirty years of service we were turned down and you came in. Do you recollect how you got in? What you said to get in? Do you recollect how you promised all things to all men? Do you recollect how you met at Chicago and framed your platform? Do you recollect that you promised to raise the necessary revenues for this Government by imposing duties upon articles that would yield revenue only, and voted down a proposition to lay any duties that would afford protection to any American laborer? You recollect all that, of course. Then that great and good man, Mr. Cleveland, came in and wrote a letter in which he tried to modify your platform.

You got in and made your declarations touching money. You were going to have silver coined just as gold was, precisely upon an equality with gold. And yet that wild-eyed son of destiny from the State of Missouri [Mr. BLAND] [laughter] has not yet had the courage to bring a bill into this House from his Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures for the free and equal coinage of silver with gold that would meet the requirements of the Democratic platform. He has, however, brought in several bills. One of them passed the House and Senate, but that great and good man who accepted your platform, free coinage, revenue tariff, and all, with some mental reservations, vetoed that bill, and on your side curses were both loud and deep.

Now, let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi that it will not answer to attempt to plead in setoff anything that you allege has been done by the Republican party. We are living in the present. What do you propose to do now to save the country and keep your pledges? Where is your policy? Who is your prophet? Is Grover the prophet? Or is Walter Q. the prophet? Or is Brother Hoke Smith the prophet? Or is David B. the prophet? [Laughter.] Who is your leader? What are you for? How are you going to crystallize legislation and write it upon the statute book? Where is the pen, and whose hand is to guide it?

Mr. BURROWS. They give it up. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman from Michigan says they give it up. I think they had better give it up. Think of it! The gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP, the Speaker of this House—do you recollect how he got to be Speaker? I do. I was here when his "boom" was born. I was one of the wicked members of the Committee on Rules in the Fifty-first Congress. I recollect very well the day when the then Speaker, now the leader of the minority and the leader of his party in this country, stood in his place and said in substance: "Performing my sworn duty under the Constitution, I find you men present here and I count you to make a quorum."

The gentleman who is now the Speaker of this House won his Democratic spurs at that time. He denounced the action of the then Speaker as revolutionary, and there went up such a cry of denunciation from the other side of the House as my ears had never before listened to, and hour after hour, and week after week, and month after month there was iteration and reiteration of that denunciation, not only in this Hall, but in the Democratic press and by the Democratic party everywhere. They denounced us as being a revolutionary party, and said that the wicked Speaker REED was at the head of the revolution. When the Democracy came into power in the Fifty-second Congress, the part which the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP, had taken in that controversy made him Speaker, and it made him Speaker the second time. Now, I am not a very old man, and all this was not a very great while ago, and my recollection of it is quite vivid, and I thought the other day, when the Committee on Rules, of which the gentleman from Georgia is the chairman, reported to this House, in substance, the Reed rule, to count a quorum: What strange antics men sometimes play! [Laughter.]

You recollect that character in Holy Writ that went to Christ and wanted to know what he should do to be saved. Christ answered that he should do this and that and the other. "All this have I done," was the reply: "what else shall I do?" "Sell that which thou hast and give it to the poor." I do not know how he obtained his possessions; but it is to be supposed that he got what he had under false pretenses; that was the intimation; and he had to make restitution. Well, now, if you should apply that rule to the present Speaker of the House, he would step down and out; for he is holding goods that he obtained under false pretenses. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I come back now to the Administration of Grover Cleveland, saying to the just everywhere "a public office is a public trust." Do you think so, my Democratic friends? If so has Grover Cleveland enforced and carried out this maxim? I do not know but he has. I am not here to abuse him or to deny him any credit which properly belongs to him. I think it possible that he or some of his friends might claim that you might get out a search warrant and that there are not enough simon pure, honest Democrats in the United States to hold the offices, and therefore they are obliged once in awhile to draft into the service a renegade Republican or a Mugwump for the highest places. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Something has been said here about "Cabinet timber." I think the gentleman from Mississippi or the gentleman from Kentucky used that expression in criticising the members of the Cabinet of the last Administration. Well, so far as I know—and we have to do with the present—so far as I am acquainted with the gentlemen who hold these positions to-day, I guess they are pretty fair men. They know how to do one thing it seems: they know how to obey. I think there is no doubt about that. When you undertake to organize an army the first requisite is to obey the commander. I take great pleasure in saying that: because whenever I find anything in an opponent or enemy, political or otherwise, that I can commend I cheerfully do so, for I would rather speak well than ill of any man. Therefore I say I do find one thing that I can commend on the part of these Secretaries: they know how to obey their chief.

Now, who are they? Gentlemen say that Mr. Wanamaker was unknown. How many men can you find outside of the State of Georgia and a tier of counties on the eastern border of Alabama who can come up and swear that they ever heard of Mr. Hoke Smith until he was made Secretary of the Interior? I am not here to say that from one standpoint he does not make a good Secretary of the Interior. After all, gentlemen, the country does not care greatly about the question who is Secretary of the Interior or Postmaster-General or Secretary of the Treasury or whether the best selections have always been made for those positions heretofore by those who are no longer Presidents. But the country is interested in knowing what are the policies that the Administration is pursuing to-day in matters of administration, and what legislation you are writing upon the statute book to-day which will start the people of this country to consuming; for whenever they commence to consume, having wherewith by which to live, there is no trouble about the people commencing to produce in order to supply that demand.

But the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Mississippi have this diplomatic bill in charge; and they must be amused. So they come in, and in answer to Democratic attacks upon the Democratic Administration of Grover Cleveland, they proceed to go back into ancient history and set up the mistake of somebody in former times, and then treat it as a setoff. Gentlemen, that will not do. It may amuse you now; but let me tell you that anything which you may say or do touching those matters does not interest the country; and unless you can enact legislation all along the line, financial and economic, that will again set this country upon the highway of prosperity, bringing employment to the millions of people upon the farm and in the factory, by which they may receive the equal of the wage that they received in 1892 when you gained power under false pretenses, you will find a little later on that you have been weighed in the balance and found wanting. My notion is that even if you should give some reasonably fair legislation to the country, you have halted so long about it and have been of so many opinions that you will be "turned down" anyhow; and I think you ought to be. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to participate at any length in this debate. But a short time ago the question was asked on the other side why T. Jefferson Coolidge, of Massachusetts, was appointed as our minister to the court of France, the implication being apparently that the appointment was not made on the ground of merit. I want to say for Mr. Coolidge that he had previous experience in our diplomatic service. He had already been (if I am not mistaken) secretary of our legation at Paris. He is an eminent linguist, proficient, not only in his own, but in many foreign tongues. His father was in the diplomatic service before him. He is a great-grandson of Thomas Jefferson, and worthy of the blood in his veins. And when the appointment was made there was not a paper in his own State of Massachusetts of any political stripe that did not commend the appointment as one eminently fit to be made.

It is not necessary, Mr. Chairman, that I should say this in Massachusetts where Mr. Coolidge is so well known; but I desire to make the statement here that it might go out alongside with the inquiry, which seemed to me to imply that it was not an appointment made upon merit alone.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit me to ask him also if that gentleman, Mr. Coolidge, had not recently, before his appointment to France, distinguished himself in a position of supreme responsibility in the Pan-American conference by his preëminent ability and wide knowledge of our interests and of our diplomatic methods?

Mr. COGSWELL. And also, I will add, his familiarity with many foreign tongues. It is true.

Mr. REED. Now, let us have Van Alen accounted for. [Laughter.] I hope either the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or at least the gentleman from Mississippi, will account for Van Alen. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. He can be accounted for on his recommendation by some of your Republican friends on the other side of the Capitol, by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and many prominent people from his own State.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I listened a moment ago to the speech of the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], in which he attempted to give to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] the credit for the rule recently adopted to count a quorum. I want to strip that gentleman of the credit claimed for him by a citation of the facts which appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD now before me.

In the Forty-sixth Congress, which assembled in this Capitol fourteen years ago, the Hon. John Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, offered this amendment to the rules:

> Whenever a quorum fails to vote on any question and objection is made for that cause, there shall be a call of the House, and the yeas and nays on the pending question shall at the same time be ordered. The Clerk shall call the roll, and each member, as he answers to his name, or is brought before the House under the proceedings of the call of the House, shall vote on the pending question. If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote shall make a quorum of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted and the pending question shall be declared decided as a majority of those voting shall appear.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is the date of that?

Mr. WISE. January 18, 1880.

Mr. Tucker on that occasion announced as his purpose in offering this rule for the guidance of the House——

Mr. PAYNE. Please tell us what became of that rule?

Mr. WISE. You wait a moment, sir. I have the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. All right. Tell us before you sit down.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Tucker announced as his purpose in offering the rule that it was to prevent that which we have very often seen in this House recently and which has occurred very often in preceding Congresses. He said:

> I offer the amendment without reference to its partisan influence in any direction, but it is to prevent the nonaction of the House when a quorum is actually present.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What was done with it?

Mr. WISE (continuing). On that occasion—and I am speaking of the Hon. THOMAS B. REED of Maine [laughter]—upon that occasion Mr. REED of Maine expressed his sentiments, and what were they? He said:

> Mr. Chairman, if it was my purpose to reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. PRISTER], it seems to me it would be a suitable and proper reply to say to him that the constitutional idea of a quorum is not the presence of a majority of the members of the House, but a majority of the members present and participating in the business of the House.
> The constitutional idea of a quorum is not the presence of a majority.

THOMAS B. REED in 1880 declared that the idea of the Constitution was not to require the physical presence of the majority of the members of the House, but—> a majority of the members present and participating in the business of the House.

A thing which THOMAS B. REED has not done for more than a month. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. REED further says:

> It is not the physical presence of members, but their judgments and their votes, that the Constitution requires.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

And never—I speak by the record—never until that same THOMAS B. REED found it necessary to enforce his tyrannical purposes and those of his party in the Fifty-first Congress did he ever come to the conclusion that under the Constitution we have the right to record a man as present for the transaction of business unless there was on his part a voluntary participation in the proceedings of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WISE. When I recall the utterances of the Hon. THOMAS B. REED in former Congresses, I must say to the honorable gentleman from Illinois that I regard all this adulation of him and the Republican party as a miserable false pretense.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. WISE. Mr. REED is not entitled to the credit of the origination of this idea of counting a quorum. It was first proposed in the American Congress by a Democrat from Virginia.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WISE. Yes. I can not refuse ever to allow you to talk. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is a very interesting subject, and I want to ask, Was it a Democratic or Republican House in which that proposition was made?

Mr. WISE. I ask the gentleman to speak a little louder.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Was the House Democratic or Republican in which that proposition was submitted?

Mr. WISE. Democratic, I believe.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Was it adopted, and if not, which party defeated it?

Mr. WISE. I have not looked at the vote. My present purpose is only to strip your leader of the false colors under which he is sailing. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. One other question in that connection?

Mr. WISE. I want to say—I have it here—that upon that occasion the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who is a Democrat, not only voted for the proposition, but made a speech in its behalf. I want to make another statement for the benefit of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], that upon that occasion another distinguished leader of the Republican party, and in my opinion a worthy leader, James A. Garfield, from your State of Ohio, voted against the proposition, and denounced it as unconstitutional. So that this pretense that the country is indebted to the Republican party for this new interpretation of the Constitution is a bald lie.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman further, it appears from the RECORD that a Democratic House defeated that proposition. On yesterday this House adopted a similar proposition. Now, while you are stripping or attempting to strip some individual, are you not stripping your own party a little?

Mr. WISE. Stop! You do not state the facts; it was not defeated, it was withdrawn. [Manifestations of derision on the Republican side.] Stop! It was never put to a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia will suspend. The Chair appeals to gentleman not to interrupt the gentleman from Virginia from their seats.

Mr. WISE. As I said before, I have not sought the floor for the purpose of imitating the gentleman from Illinois, or to claim the adoption of this rule as a triumph for Democracy. I have only sought the floor to denounce his statement that it is a triumph of REED or of Republicanism, and I am sustaining my position by proof from the RECORD, in which I show that Mr. REED of Maine denounced the proposition in 1880 as a violation of the Constitution, and the leaders of the Republican party joined him in the denunciation. I am only here to say that when you come into this Hall to make your loud boasts about the adoption of this rule as originating from Republican suggestion you are false to history, and when you attempt to give your leader the credit for it you make him the object of ridicule, in view of his recorded position on the subject.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WISE. I want to make one other remark. I did not vote for that rule yesterday, not because I agree with Mr. REED that we have not the power under the Constitution to count a quorum. I have always maintained the proposition. I did not vote for it—and I am glad of the opportunity to make the statement—I did not vote for it, because I had had no opportunity to examine it after it was read at the Clerk's desk, and I will never give the sanction of my vote to any proposition unless the opportunity is afforded for examination. I refused to vote for it on that account, and I refused to vote for it because the opportunity was not granted for free debate.

Every proposition of that kind ought to be freely and fully discussed before its adoption by the Representatives of the American people. It is on that account that I refused to give my sanction to that rule. But I believe as firmly as any man that if the power resides here, as unquestionably it does, to bring a man from California to his seat in this House, we have the right to count his presence for the transaction of business. That is all, Mr. Chairman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly to interrupt the gentlemen upon the other side who are appearing in the confessional with reference to their conduct toward Speaker REED during the Fifty-first Congress. I wish to say that I think there is hardly anything that was more surprising during this discussion than the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr SPRINGER] not only seconded the resolution offered by Hon. Randolph Tucker of Virginia for counting a quorum, but that he made a speech upon it. We were all very much surprised that Mr. SPRINGER was heard on that occasion. Now, I would like to ask gentlemen upon the other side who are making their confessions with reference to their conduct during the Fifty-first Congress whether this side then made any claim of originality with respect to the counting of a quorum other than the fact that Speaker REED actually counted a quorum in that Congress?

Nobody makes any pretense that there was any discovery or any invention as to the custom of counting a quorum in every other legislative body except in the United States Congress. Every man who is familiar with parliamentary law knows that there is not a hint, from the dawn of common law or the application of parliamentary law down to the present day, of any other way of determining a quorum in any legislative body whatever other than by a count of the speaker or the presiding officer of the body. Now, there was no man any more determined in action, no man more persistent and severe in denunciation of Speaker REED for counting a quorum than the gentleman from Georgia, who now occupies the position of Speaker of this House. Mr. CRISP said:

> Yes; during this whole session the gentleman and his party, if I may be permitted to borrow a simile, have seemed to bow before the Speaker of the House with much the same feeling with which the Hindoo bows before the hideous image of his god; "He knows that he is ugly, but he feels that he is great."

The Republicans would like to know whether the Speaker of this House is as ready to apologize for these words as the other Democratic members are for their conduct and words.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BAILEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6108) had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills; and pending that motion, I desire to make a motion to limit general debate. I have desired all day to secure an arrangement, and I have tried to be perfectly fair. If any gentleman desires to speak I should like to know. I am willing to make any agreement that is fair.

Mr. HITT. At what time to-morrow does the gentleman desire to close general debate?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like to close general debate in thirty minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. Not to-night; some time to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think that by the time gentlemen confess on that side, it will take up most of to-morrow, to say nothing of this side.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Say an hour, then.

Mr. HITT. Say one hour on a side to-morrow. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is not here, and he has asked to be heard. I know that the gentleman is anxious to speak upon this bill, and he should have an opportunity, as he was formerly the Solicitor of the Treasury.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Would not sufficient opportunity be afforded to him to speak under the five-minute rule?

Mr. HITT. Oh, no.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HITT. I think we should have one hour on a side. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] desires to address the House on this bill.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that general debate be closed in one hour, and that the gentlemen on the other side may have forty minutes of that time.

Mr. HITT. Let us have an hour. I promised the gentleman that he should have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Well, say an hour and fifteen minutes.

Mr. REED. Let us have an hour on this side.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. We do not want further debate, that I know of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all general debate on this bill close in one hour and fifteen minutes.

Mr. REED. If we can have one hour.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. We want it to-morrow.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Let it be taken to night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the debate be closed in one hour and fifteen minutes, one hour to be given to the minority?

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Iowa, who desires to speak, is not here this afternoon.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. He ought to be.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. We will give him ten minutes to-morrow of general debate.

Mr. HITT and Mr. BURROWS. Oh, no.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to make this suggestion, that there can be a unanimous agreement that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] should have thirty minutes during the five-minutes debate.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will agree to that.

Mr. BAILEY. And that can be subtracted from the hour and fifteen minutes for general debate, if that is now agreed upon.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will agree to that.

Mr. HITT. An hour and fifteen minutes? Do you wish to adjourn now?

Mr. BAILEY. That will close general debate on all except the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HITT. Let us have half an hour to-morrow and let the gentleman from Ohio Mr. GROSVENOR] proceed now.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. And limit the general debate to an hour and fifteen minutes?

Mr. HITT. Let the gentleman from Ohio go on this evening. He is the only one on our side who wants to speak now.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio desire?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the pending proposition be continued for thirty minutes this afternoon, the time to be occupied by the minority, and for forty-five minutes to-morrow, of which thirty minutes shall be given to the minority.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 1916) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge Little River, in the State of Arkansas; when the Speaker signed the same.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

On motion of Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills, Mr. BAILEY in the chair.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6148) making appropriation for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in connection with my remarks made this afternoon the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], to which I referred, or such portions of them as I may desire, and also the remarks made by Mr. Garfield, by Mr. Tucker, and by other gentlemen who took part in the discussion upon that occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. REED. Those remarks ought to be scattered all over the RECORD. They have been up to date, and I think the practice ought to be continued. [Laughter.]

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] challenged the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] to answer whether he had been successful in smashing the Wilson bill, and to state the effect of his election upon that measure. The gentleman from New York replied, in substance, that he had not claimed that his election would smash the Wilson bill, and very modestly refrained from giving expression to a few facts which I think he might with perfect propriety have given utterance to on this occasion, especially in view of the challenge of the gentleman from Tennessee. It will be borne in mind that the Wilson bill passed this House at about the time the gentleman from New York was elected, and the question was not as to the effect of that election upon the bill here, because this House was joined to a certain class of Democratic, or alleged Democratic idols, among which was the doctrine of "free raw materials," and therefore it was not expected by any intelligent man that any election in New York or anywhere else could operate successfully upon a majority of more than 100 to defeat the Wilson bill in this body.

But, Mr. Chairman, something has had a most serious and damaging effect upon the Wilson bill. That is what I wish to speak about very briefly, and I wish to supply a few suggestions which the extreme modesty of the gentleman from New York seems to have prevented him from presenting to the House during his admirable speech. The Wilson bill, as it passed this House, was a bill framed upon the idea of "free raw materials" and "tariff for revenue only," and among other free things in that bill was free sugar. The agents of a certain great trust in this great country, the most wealthy, the most arrogant, the most dominating, the most "democratic" that there is in all the world, came here and, under one pretext and another, crowded into this House and by its agents urged upon members the necessity of protecting the "infant industry" of sugar-refining in the city of New York. They failed to accomplish their purpose, and by an overwhelming majority the House of Representatives sent the bill to the Senate with sugar absolutely free. But what is the condition of that bill to-day?

The answer to that question is the answer which the gentleman from New York might well have given, and in giving it he might have claimed that the handwriting which was put so conspicuously on the wall in the city of New York, in the district which he represents, had had a great deal to do with the present disfigurement and dismemberment of the so-called Wilson bill, which is to day filled from one end to the other with concessions made to the most agressive trusts in the United States. The members of the whisky trust have come forward and given notice that their demands can be met only by certain concessions in the matter of figures, and in the matter of time, and they have got their concessions in the committee's report. The sugar trust, aided by the appeal from Louisiana, has come forward and has succeeded in putting into that bill not only a protective tariff upon a foreign-produced article, an article nine-tenths of which comes from abroad, but also in putting upon the domestic manufacture of refined sugar a tariff not only for protection but one which is substantially prohibitive against the importation of foreign sugar of refined grade. This tax is wholly a burden upon the people, and will put millions upon millions into the pockets of the trust.

So the Democratic party stand here to-day facing their own argument. The argument made on this floor in favor of free raw material has been overturned by the demand made in the Senate, which has already been conceded, that coal and iron ore shall be protected, not as much as they ought to be, I grant, but enough to answer and overthrow and deny and defeat all the arguments that were made in this House upon the subject of the Wilson bill.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not know that I correctly understood the gentleman: but I understood him to say that the duty placed upon refined sugar by the committee of the Senate is protective to the extent of excluding competition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do say so, practically excluding foreign refined sugar.

Mr. BYNUM. Does not the gentleman know it to be a fact that the present duty on refined sugar is much greater than that proposed in the Senate?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes: and there is no duty on raw sugar.

Mr. BYNUM. And therefore the trust has that much more protection, because it gets its raw sugar free.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the present law is a protective law, and the Democratic claim is for a tariff for revenue only.

And that is not all of it, Mr. Chairman. We have it announced now that in order to secure the full cooperation of the sugar trust—to overcome the dangers that beset that bill to day in the Senate—a piece of blank paper has been furnished to the sugar trust and they have been notified to write their own tariff if they will only secure the passage of the bill in the Senate.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman knows that is only a newspaper statement——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Only a newspaper statement, that is all.

Mr. BYNUM. And it has been denied by the members of the Finance Committee of the Senate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not seen that; and I make no charge of the kind as coming from myself. But it is enough to say that upon every point in that bill on which the advocates of free raw material made their battle in this House, the Senate has changed it and abandoned the position taken here. And that is not all. Collars and cuffs have been protected——

Mr. BYNUM. Of course the gentleman understands that under the present law the protection to the sugar trust is greater than that provided for in the Senate bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not care anything about the present law. The present law is a protective law. I am talking about the bill that we sent over to them; and I am pointing out that the Democrats of this House will have to abandon every argument that they made upon the floor of this House, and turn round as conspicuously as my friend from Virginia has demonstrated that some of us have upon the subject of counting a quorum.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman says "the bill we sent over." Of course I have no quarrel with him——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am speaking of the House having sent it over. The gentleman now is only occupying time and listening to the music of his own voice, which he always finds so charming.

Mr. BYNUM. If the gentleman prefers to hear his own, I give way of course.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do very much. I always like to hear the gentleman from Indiana when he has anything to say; but when he has not I do not like to be interrupted as a mere matter of killing time.

Now follow this bill all along the line of it, as now before the Senate, and there is no "Wilson bill" left. And that is not the worst of it. We do not yet know what is going to be the outcome of this matter. We find that one distinguished Senator yesterday, following in the footsteps of one who spoke last week, comes forward and says that if this bill, even as it now appears upon the files of the Senate, shall be passed, "God save the Democratic party." Why? Because the manufactured articles produced in the State of New Jersey are not sufficiently protected by this bill.

So when the gentleman from Tennessee states that the election of the gentleman from New York has not had any effect upon the Wilson bill, he is greatly mistaken. Not only did the election in New York have an effect in that direction, but the elections in New Jersey, in Rhode Island, in Ohio, in Michigan, in Missouri, in Illinois, in Wisconsin, and in Montana have had a most powerful effect. They have served notice upon the Democrats of this House that if they persist in passing the Wilson bill, the prayer of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey will be absolutely in vain and of no effect.

So, Mr. Chairman the gentleman from New York might have presented all this line of argument—which he could have put in much better form than I have—to caution the gentleman from Tennessee that it is hardly wise for a Democrat to-day to exult; because there is such a thing somewhere as the dead and mangled body of the so-called "Wilson bill." The history of the Wilson bill might as well be written now. It is dead—dead past all regeneration and resuscitation—absolutely as dead as the man who died one hundred years ago.

You can not do it. You can not get on this floor a hundred votes in favor of it. You will have to take the Senate bill that the trusts of the country have organized; and you Democrats on that side of the House will have to march up and accept the platform of principles that the great trusts of the country have laid down for you. You will not put a tax on beer. You will not lift the burden by thirty-seven to forty millions of dollars by putting another dollar a barrel on beer. You will be compelled to put a cent a pound or upward on raw sugar, drawing $4,000,000 directly out of the pockets of the people of this country, or you will have no bill at all. The men who passed the Wilson bill, the committee that framed it, will be lost sight of; and the time will come, as it has already come in the Senate, when on your knees you will obey the demands of the men who have coerced the Democratic party on the very principles which you said you meant to fight so valiantly for in this House.

Now, I will not discuss the question under consideration. If there is any comfort to be had by the Democratic party out of the resolutions brought into this House and adopted, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in relation to the Sandwich Islands matter, I am sure you ought to have the consolation of it, for a Democratic committee of the Senate and a Democratic Senate led by a Democratic leader of that body have treated the resolutions as though they had never been passed, and the whole country has laughed at them, scorned them, treated them with utter contempt. And no man in the United States has been found outside of this Hall who has defended the action of the Democratic Administration in that particular matter. They have been repudiated by the Democratic party in the Senate; they have been repudiated by the deliberate judgment of the Democratic party of the whole country, and even the Democratic Administration to-day does not attempt to stand upon the false ground given out by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House.

So there is no balm in Gilead for the Democratic party. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

It has made the mistake of attempting to bring factions educated in wholly divergent political opinions, representing divergent Democratic sentiment in one section of the country and Democratic sentiment in another section of the country together, sentiments so utterly apart, so utterly discordant, that there has been no hopes of a possibility of reconciliation, and yet they have attempted to bring these discordant elements in the House together and formulate a plan of action.

It can not be done. It is demonstrated beyond the possibility of question that it can not be done. It is a demonstration of the fact that the two wings of a party that separate on principle can not be brought together and formulate and carry forward a great principle of party action. And the Democratic party to-day stands weaker before the country, more thoroughly condemned before the country, more utterly incapacitated before the country than did the Democratic party of 1860, when it had one convention at Charleston and another at Baltimore, that divided it in two, and attempted afterwards to divide the country in two; and the Democratic party of 1894, leading up to the dismemberment of 1896, will demonstrate that it is only necessary to put this party into power to show its utter incapacity to do anything except to dismember itself and to die. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House, thirty minutes were to be consumed in debate this afternoon, that time to be occupied by the minority of the House. The gentleman from Ohio has occupied twenty minutes, leaving still ten minutes to be occupied this afternoon by that side.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the ten minutes be transferred to the time allowed for debate to-morrow to this side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BAILEY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.
